EXHIBITORS' NEWS.

WISCONSIN.

THE News at Beloit is taking a sort of census of its moving picture fans by publishing a questionaire coupon. It aims to ascertain the class of films and the favorite actors nad actresses of the patrons. The coupon is to be addressed to the manager of the theater which the writer patronizes regularly and not the paper.

State censorship of moving pictures was opposed in an address before the Wisconsin Branch of the Mothers' and Parent-Teachers' Congress at Milwaukee by Secretary Charles H. Phillips of the Milwaukee Citizens' Committee of Motion Pictures. He explained the work of the Milwaukee committee in constructive co-operation with the exhibitors to secure the class of films desired. He referred to the good work of the National Board of Censorship. The National Board is using the Milwaukee committee as a model and is endeavoring to organize similar committees in other cities which are misguidedly clamoring for a local censorship.

The Progressive League of Chippewa Falls had two booster days in November, which were advertised extensively in that part of the state. Special programs were secured by the exhibitors.

The Reading Circle at Evansville, Wis., is probably the first in the United States to sponsor a course of feature photoplays for its community. In co-operation with Manager Magee of Magee's opera house, the circle offers season tickets at 75 cents for the following seven attractions: James O'Neill in "The Count of Monte Cristo," Mrs. Fiske in "Tess of the D'Urbervilles," Arnold Daly in "The Port of Missing Man," William Farnum in "The Redemption of David Corson," Mary Pickford in "The Good Little Devil," John Barrymore in "An American Citizen," and Mary Pickford in "Tess of the Storm Country."

THE MOONSHINE MAID AND THE MAN (Dec. 7).—Deeply in love with Nancy, a mountain girl, Dave, awkward and bashful, proposes, but she tells him they could not live without money, that he must first get a thousand dollars, then she will give him her answer. He despairs of ever winning Nance until he sees a reward of 1,000 dollars offered for information leading to the capture of moonshiners in that county. Not knowing that Job, Nance's father, is the owner of a large illicit still, Dave determines to win that money by locating the still and its owners. Meanwhile, Job breaks his leg, and Nance offers to bring the goods to the secret meeting place. He agrees and suggests she dress up in his clothes, as a disguise. That night, Dave, coming to serenade his sweetheart, sees what he believes is a strange man coming from the house and sneaking off into the woods. Filled with jealous suspicions, he follows the "man" right to the still, where the moonshine whiskey is made. The thousand dollars looming up large before him, he hurries home and informs the sheriff. That night, Nance begs her father to keep away from the moonshining business, while Dave, with two officers, starts for the still. Nance has to make another visit to the still that evening to meet Kelly, the liquor purchaser. In her men's clothes, she is tracked to the still by Dave and the officers. In the bitter fight which follows, Dave is fatally shot. Nance, heartbroken, bends over the form of Dave as he looks up at her and begs her forgiveness for having led the officers to the still saying: "I didn't know, Nance, that you and your dad ran it." He dies and the officers leave her weeping bitterly beside the man who had loved her so well.

SUNSHINE AND SHADOWS (Special—Two Parts—Dec. 8).—Through the machinations of John Gates, a dishonest employee, Martin Drew, affianced to Helen Redmond, is wrongfully accused of theft in the bank where the two men work. Although in love with him, Helen lacks the moral courage to stand by Martin in his hour of trial, and breaks off their engagement. Discouraged, Martin goes to a distant city, but fails to find employment. He meets Edna Thompson by rescuing her from two toughs. He falls in love with her and she frankly tells him her life's history and its many vicissitudes and questionable associations. With a full understanding of her past, they are married and go to the country. Martin and Edna succeed, after a time, in securing a farm to work on shares, and are very happy in the new life. Gates, the dishonest cashier, is detected in a serious defalcation, and before being taken to jail, confesses to the directors of the bank that Martin is not guilty of the previous theft. The bank officials immediately get in touch with Martin, and he is reinstated as cashier of the bank. Edna has misgivings at the thought of the change, but for a time they live happily in the city. Helen Redmond, still in love with Martin, is very bitter on learning he is married, and her love is turned to hate. She learns in a peculiar way of Edna's past and forces her to go away by threatening to reveal it. Edna at first refuses, but for Martin's sake she at last goes quietly away to the little country farmhouse where she and Martin had been so happy. He is furious on learning of her departure, curses Helen and follows Edna with all possible speed. He finds her sitting disconsolately on the doorstep of the little house, and the shadows of the past are soon forgotten in their reunion in the midst of sunshine and love.

THE ATHLETIC FAMILY (Dec. 9).—Jake Punchim, a retired heavyweight champion, keeps himself, wife and twin daughters, Helen and Dot, in training, by a course of athletic exercises in their little gymnasium, connected with the house. Dot has serious objections to the continual round of strenuous exercise and hates boxing worst of all, as her sister Helen always punches her all over the place. While out walking one day she meets Gussie Wendell, an effiminate young man who does not like boxing either, and a flirtation ends in their making an appointment to meet in the park at two o'clock. Pa Punchim goes out for a walk. On the way he assists in lifting a wagon out of a rut, picks up a piano single-handed and sets it in a van, and other trifling stunts, so that he attracts an admiring crowd by the time he gets back home. Helen is introduced by Charley Hands, a friend, to Billy Banghim, a husky boxing instructor, and she asks permission to box with one of his pupils. She soon knocks him down and Billy falls in love with her on the spot. He makes an appointment to meet her in the park at two o'clock. Through mistakes in identity, the two girls meet the wrong men. Misunderstandings lead to harsh words and the result is that Gussie is thrown into the lake by strong-armed Helen, while Billy gets a similar ducking at the hands of Jake Punchim, when Dot tells her father a man is chasing her. Gussie and Billy meet after swimming ashore and vow vengeance. They find Jake sleeping peacefully on a bench, and heave him, bench and all, into the water. Then they run into Dot and Helen and explanations are quickly made. Pa Punchim comes near thrashing the young men, but Helen explains it all and deciding the joke is on everyone, all burst out laughing, and after introductions, are soon the best of friends.

PURE GOLD (Dec. 10).—Stranded in Yellow City, alone and penniless, Helen Cross, a dancer, is compelled to accept an engagement with town saloon-keeper as singer and dancer. Her popularity is pronounced from the start, but becoming disgusted with the rough miners and the life in general, she determines to escape it all. Partly disguised, she gets out unnoticed and wanders through the hills. Overcome with fatigue, she knocks at the door of a lonely cabin. She is admitted and silently extended the hospitality of the cabin by the lone miner. Next morning she prepares to leave and thanks her host, but receives only a gruff recognition. Then regretting his cold attitude, he asks her to stay and tell her story. She does so and he is greatly impressed, but the following evening, not realizing the woman's sterling character, he attempts familiarities. She resents them, even threatening to kill herself should he persist. With new-born respect, he quietly leaves her after showing her how to bar the door. Next morning he is stricken with fever, and although she has decided to leave that day, Helen stays and nurses him through three weeks of fever. He recovers, and in their new attitude towards each other, the two become the best of friends. While helping him work his gold claim, she one day strikes a pocket—or slight depression—containing several good-sized nuggets of gold. Thinking to surprise him, she hides them. He finds them, and becomes suspicious. He says nothing, but watches her, and comes to the conclusion that she is planning to steal them. Feeling under obligations to Helen, he still remains silent, but she notices his strange coldness, and despairingly decides to go away. She places a little note where he can see it, in which the heart-broken woman explains what she planned to do with the gold. He finds it and awakens to the fact that Helen's character is like the nuggets—pure gold. The joyful reunion which follows expresses more than words can tell.

A STRAND OF BLOND HAIR (Dec. 11).—A beautiful blond lady, who is combing her tresses at a window, so arouses Archie's admiration that he sneaks up and cuts off a lock of her hair and rushes off to a milliner's, where he buys a pretty ribbon to tie around it. While dining at a restaurant, he greatly disgusts Bunny at a near-by table—by fervently caressing the wisp of hair. A couple of Artie's college chums enter, see him with the lock of hair and cleverly substitute some horsehair for the blond tresses, placing the latter, unnoticed, in Bunny's pocket. Artie is wild with rage, and believing Bunny put the horsehair in his pocket, vows vengeance. Bunny goes to the office and that evening, instead of going home, he goes to the club, where he sits in a game of poker. He "cleans up" and next morning gives Flora, his wife, a goodly portion of his winnings to quiet her expostulations regarding his late hours. Already made suspicious by his generosity, she becomes convinced he has been up to some deviltry, searches his pockets and finds the golden tress. Bent on revenge, she sallies forth with the lock of hair, and attempts to match it with the tonsorial adornments of every blond she meets. Her experiences are very funny and decidedly strenuous, but she does not locate the owner of the hair. Meantime, Bunny meets Artie in a restaurant and they nearly come to blows. The manager separates them, however, and they soon become friends. Blondy enters and Artie introduces her to Bunny. The three make a jolly party, and all goes well until they leave the restaurant. Then Flora happens by and not only discovers the hair to match the blond tresses she has, but also sees her husband in the lady's company. For a while a big time is imminent, but explanations clear matters up and Artie and Blondy take their departure, while Bunny is obliged to buy Flora a huge bouquet of flowers to pacify her. It takes most of his roll, but he feels it is worth it.

HOW TO DO IT AND WHY, OR CUTEY AT COLLEGE (Special—Two Parts—Dec. 12.—Cheeky and persistent, Butt-in, the Book Agent, makes the acquaintance of Jack Sportington and his college chums. Jack is in love with Rose Woods, but her mother does not approve of him. Jack and his friends arrange a little party and as he is broke, writes his wealthy uncle—who is a spiritualist—for money, telling him it is to defray the expense of a seance. Uncle is delighted to learn his nephew has become a spiritualist and sends the money, later deciding to come himself and witness the seance. The boys are having a fine time dancing and singing, when uncle rings the bell. They desperately beg Butt-in to help them out and he agrees to get busy on a seance in two minutes. With the aid of some curtains and curtain-poles he rigs up a presentable "spook" booth and after the others hide, Uncle is admitted. He is soon enjoying the "spirit" manifestations immensely and just as everything is running smoothly, Mrs. Woods enters and exposes the whole show. All make a getaway except Butt-in, who—in the guise of a wild Indian—is caught and arrested. Uncle John becomes infatuated with Mrs. Woods and goes to board at her home. Butt-in's wonderful line of talk keeps him out of jail and after interesting Mrs. Woods in his new book on hypnotism, he becomes interested in her. This causes jealousy and Uncle John challenges Butt-in to hypnotize him! Then Rose takes a hand, and telling Uncle John there is a deep-laid plot to hypnotize him, gets him to hide in Bridget's room, where Bridget finds him and leads him downstairs by the ear. Butt-in appears and dramatically declares he had hypnotized him and sent him to the room against his will. Uncle John is glad to accept this version, Butt-in wins the widow and later helps Jack and Rose in their love-making.

LUBIN.

THE BELOVED ADVENTURER, NO. 13, THROUGH DESPERATE HAZARDS (Nov. 7).—Betty, Lady Cecil, has been the victim of a plot formed by her former self-constituted guardian, Carson, the Nevada gambler, and the adventuress, Countess Lurovich, who, for revenge on Lord Cecil and in the hope of profit, have caused the girl to think that Lord Cecil no longer loves her and is ashamed to present her to the world as his wife. Broken-hearted, Betty has allowed Carson to take her away, and he has arranged that they escape from England aboard Captain Lars Pieterson's tramp schooner. After all attempts to trace Betty have failed, Lord Cecil accidentally sees her as she gets into a motorboat in Whitehaven harbor, but immediately she disappears in the darkness.

While wearily searching the water-front, Cecil saves a woman who is on the point of throwing herself from a pier, and learns her history. The woman is Sarah Gray, who, in her native inland village, had come to a faded middle age with nothing of romance or beauty to relieve the drabness of her life of labor and pinching economy. She owned a little cottage where she lived with her old mother, and had painfully saved a little money, so that altogether she was worth about eight hundred pounds. Captain Pieterson appeared in the village, won the heart of Sarah Gray, and, promising to marry her and take her to America, induced her to turn over to him her entire little fortune. He then brutally jilted her and, unable to face the certainty of the poor-house for her old mother and herself, Sarah Gray attempted to end her wretched life.

Lord Cecil determines to at least recover the stolen money, and hires a motorboat to take him and the woman to Pieterson's ship. The schooner has sailed, but the motorboat overtakes it, and Cecil succeeds in getting aboard unobserved, getting the money, and returning it to Sarah Gray. Cecil is discovered before he can escape, however, and is abandoned by his boatman. His life is saved only by the breaking out of fire in the forward hold and the panic-stricken flight of the Captain and crew. The schooner is laden with contraband powder. Cecil discovers that Betty and Carson have also been left on the schooner. Carson makes a murderous attack, wounding Cecil, and is himself killed in the duel which follows. In the face of apparently certain death, Cecil and Betty see clearly into each other's heart, and await the end in a clinging embrace. Sarah Gray, however, bribes the motorboatman to take the chance of returning to the burning schooner, and Betty and Cecil are taken off. A few minutes later the fire reaches the powder, and the vessel disappears in the blazing roar of the explosion.

DOBS AT THE SHORE (Dec. 8).—Jemula Heckla and his wife are spending the day at the shore when Helen Martin, a young and beautiful heiress, escorted by Count Casco, are preparing for a dip in the ocean. While the Count has gone to get Helen an ice-cream cone, Mrs. Heckla falls asleep and Jemula starts to flirt with Helen. Afraid that his wife will wake up, Jem makes a dummy out of the sand, drapes his coat and hat around it, puts it at his wife's side and sneaks off. Sneaking over to Helen's side Jem attempts to kiss her, when the Count returns and smashes the ice-cream cone in Jem's face. Jem kicks the Count in the chest, and he falls over Jem's sleeping wife. She jumps up, thinks the Count has smashed her husband and starts to beat him up. Hearing a yell Mrs. Heckla turns and sees her husband trying to kiss Helen. Snatching a revolver that is in the old carpet bag, Mrs. Heckla starts chasing her husband, Helen and the Count. She chases her husband and the Count into the ocean where they almost drown. Helen runs off for the police and the life guards. The Count climbs up a rope to the top of a pier. Jem climbs the other side, while his wife is running along the beach looking for him. The life guards are diving for Jem and the Count. On the top of the pier Jem sneaks up on the Count and knocks him off the pier. Jem is about to start for the shore when he sees the police force headed by Helen dashing along the pier. In his excitement he falls off. The cops dash out on the end of the pier, grab a rope and throw it to the struggling men in the water. Jem, the Count and two of the life guards grab the rope and yell for the cops to pull them in. The cops on the pier are pulling on the rope. Mrs. Heckla sees them from the other end of the pier and she starts to shoot. The cops drop the rope and dive off the pier among the struggling crowd in the water. Mrs. Heckla runs to the end of the pier and starts shooting at the men in the water. Helen, who has been hiding behind a post, jumps and runs for the bath house. Mrs. Heckla catches Jem just as he is sneaking out of the water; she grabs him and drags him off. The cops take charge of the Count, who is arrested for attempted suicide.

HE MADE HIS MARK (Dec. 8).—Hank Peters simply cannot help kissing pretty girls when he sees them. The worst of it is that his wife knows of his weakness but she can never catch him with the goods. He kisses the parlor maid while his wife is in the kitchen. He also kisses the cook. His wife, Ellen, becomes interested in an article in the paper on the use of thumb prints for detective work, and wonders if it will not work as well with lip prints. Hank kisses her hand just before going to the office, and she successfully develops this with a power obtained from the chemist. With the same powder she develops the prints of kisses on the cheeks of both maid and cook, then starts for her husband's office, where she experiments on the typist. Poor Bess is simply covered with marks. She was not to blame for she needed the work, but she loses her job and her big brother avenges her wrongs. When Hank gets home, the cook and the maid, who have also been dismissed, are laying in wait for him, and what Bess's brother omitted to do to him they finish, and worst of it is that his wife merely tells him that "The wages of kisses is kicks."

A RECENT CONFEDERATE VICTORY (Special—Two Parts—Dec. 9).—In a northern city Robert Williams, an old negro, who by his industry and shrewdness has become well to do, feels an overpowering longing to see once more the places of his youth in Old Virginia, and to his "young master" he recalls vividly a day in '65 when "Old Master," a wounded lion at bay, gave his life in a vain effort to protect his home from looting bushwackers, how his own grandfather, old Uncle Ned, had forced him, shaking with terror, to help conceal and so save from the looters a certain iron box. Then he ran away, following a column of Union soldiers to the North. He did not know that Uncle Ned had died, and that he alone could tell the whereabouts of the iron box.

Williams journeys to the South, and eventually arrives at the Fairfax home, where he is kindly welcomed by Clay Fairfax, the former "Young Master," now a middle-aged man, an invalid, and almost in poverty. Of the great estate, only the old house remains. Fairfax has one child, Louise, who loves him with unselfish devotion. She has determined that she must sacrifice herself for her father by marrying Judd Harvey, a rich but unattractive youth, giving up Ned Ferry, whom she loves,but who is as poor as themselves. Williams soon hears of the mysteriously missing Fairfax fortune—it is known that in 1860 the father of Clay Fairfax received $50,000 in gold for a plantation and his journal shows that the sum was invested in Government bonds, but what became of these bonds no one knows. The interest alone would now amount to more than $125,000. Williams recalls the incident of the iron box, and secretly visits the hidden place, to find it undisturbed. He keeps this discovery a secret from Fairfax. Silas Gregg, a money lender and rascal, also knows of the lost fortune, and believes the bonds to be concealed about the old house. He attempts to buy the house "and all other property or right" of the Fairfax estate, but his small offer is rejected. To him Williams discloses his discovery on the understanding that he shall have half of the bonds if Gregg can secure them. Gregg does succeed in buying the Fairfax estate, the house and all other properties or rights, for $20,000 cash. This means comfort and health for Fairfax and happiness for Louise, as she promptly goes to her poor sweetheart. As soon as he is in possession Gregg implores Williams to lead him to the treasure, and Williams does so. As Gregg is gloating over the bonds, he discovers a letter from Williams calling his attention to the fact that the bonds were issued by the Confederate Government, and worthless. The moral though not legal thief has been caught in his own snare. Williams, having bidden good-bye to his "young master," is on his way to his northern home.

THE MAN FROM THE SEA (Special—Two Parts—Dec. 10).—Carroll Brown and Bradley Wolf, both rich young men, are suitors for the hand of Marjory Sheppard. Marjory likes both men equally well and practically places the matter of a decision in their hands. Brown, who owns the yacht, Pole Star, has a fight with his captain and crew over wages and they desert after a melee in which Brown whips one of them. It is an opportune time to press his suit, but Wolf's presence delays the matter. Believing that with one out of the way the other would have a chance to win the girl, the two men go to Wolf's amateur wireless station on the beach of his seashore estate. The assistant is dismissed and it is to be a question of one hand of poker, high cards winning. Wolf cheats and Brown leaves to board his yacht, now deserted. He meets Marjory on the way and is compelled to be indifferent to her. She, piqued, turns to Wolf.

That evening, late, the yacht is set adrift and fired while Brown is in his wireless cabin. When he discovers the fire he also finds that he is barricaded in and that there is no escape. Inadvertently, through the balance of the pack of cards he carried away with him from Wolf's shack, he also learns that he was tricked and cheated. He calls Wolf on the wireless, but Wolf refuses him aid. Brown then tells him that though he has cheated him he will be with him on his wedding night. Wolf laughs at this seemingly impossible message and goes to meet Marjory.

The next morning they find the beach strewn with wreckage, mute evidence of the blown up yacht. A wedding date is set for some months after, and the only disconcerting thing to mar Wolf's happiness is the message that comes to him, every little while, over the wireless that "I will be with you on your wedding night." and signed Carroll Brown, nine fathoms deep off Scarboro reef. On the night of the wedding the message comes again, only this time it reads "to-night." Wolf is called to his shack by his assistant at three minutes of ten. There, the sacred assistant having deserted him, he waits for the man who says he is coming back from the dead. Brown comes back, soaked and sodden, his clothes rotting and intertwined with sea grasses. The two men face each other—the living and the dead. Brown tells Wolf of his cowardice and that he will never marry Marjory, but agrees to give him one more chance. They play again for her three cuts, high cards winning. Brown wins and laughs at Wolf when in a frenzy he tells him that he will never take Marjory back to the sea with him. Marjory, meanwhile, becoming impatient, takes the machine and goes down to get Wolf. The machine skids and plunges over the sea wall into the sea and the half-drowned chauffeur is all that comes back from its depths, carrying the dread news to the wedding guests. They communicate with Wolf by phone just as Brown is leaving. It is the last link that binds him to sanity and seizing his revolver he fires repeatedly at the man from the sea as he passes into the night. The guests hurry down to the shore, but do not see Wolf as he throws open the door, but face both Brown and Marjory, sea bedraggled and death lined. Wolf staggers back as they disappear into the sea and frightened guests later find him stretched out over the table of his wireless, the smoking revolver clutched in his lifeless hand.

ON MOONSHINE MOUNTAIN (Dec. 11).—John Ford, revenue officer, is ordered to Moonshine Mountain to track illicit distillers. He has a posse of officers, disguised as railroad laborers. In the mountains he meets Anne, a mountain girl, with whose mother he obtains board. He admires her. Brice Gordon, overworked at his desk in a newspaper office, leaves for a vacation, and selects Moonshine Mountain for a fishing trip. He also secures board at Anne's house. Jake, a moonshiner, attempts to kiss Anne while he is drunk and Brice rescues her from him, thus earning Jake's enmity.

Anne and Brice have fallen in love with each other, and Ford becomes jealous. He is tracking Jake through the woods in the hope of finding the still when he comes upon Brice and Anne. He forgets his purpose in his wild jealousy and turns from his eavesdropping to find himself covered by Jake's rifle. Ford saves himself by telling Jake that Brice is the real revenue officer, and Jake hurries off to warn his companion at the still. Ford follows. He tracks Jake, but is discovered by the moonshiners when they leave the still and pursued down over the mountain.

Meanwhile, Brice and Anne have returned to the little farm, where Brice assists Anne in the barnyard. There is an old bell near the house, formerly used to call the men to dinner, but now abandoned. Ford, pursued by the moonshiners, wounds Jake, but, followed by the others, he tries to reach the bell in time to give the alarm to his posse at the railroad. Just as he is about to pull the rope, he is shot by Zeb, one of the moonshiners. Badly wounded, he manages to reach the house, just as Brice, who has heard the shot, rushes up. The two moonshiners, arriving at that moment, take Brice for the man they have pursued and cover him with their guns. He tries to explain, but Zeb sees the reporter's badge which he wears on his vest and is convinced that he is the officer. Anne, alarmed for Brice's safety, hurries from the barnyard. She reads the inscription on the badge and tells them what it is. They are about to release Brice, when the wounded Jake arrives, and declares that "Them as wear badges, gets strung up." He tells one of his men to get a rope. Anne tries to escape to get help, but is captured by Jake. Zeb goes for a rope and sees only the one attached to the old bell. He pulls it from its fastening. The bell rings. At the railroad the posse hear the alarm. Ford, in the cabin, watches the preparations for Brice's death unmindful of his wound in the knowledge that his rival will be out of the way. The rope is around Brice's neck. He looks a farewell at Anne. Jake holds her in his arms. Zeb is about to swing Brice from the ground when the posse dashes in. Brice is released. In the cabin Ford lies dead upon the floor. Later, when Brice returns to the city, Anne goes with him.

THE FRESH AIR CURE (Dec. 12).—Tony has a terrible cold and the sympathetic Mr. Strong, a fresh air enthusiast, tells him that if he will sleep out of doors he will not catch cold. Tony sees Strong's sleeping porch and thinks he will try it, but as he, Tony, has no porch he is forced to set up his bed in the street. Much to his disgust, his daughter, Anna, is in love with Izzy Silverstein, the son of an old enemy, and for fear that the young couple will elope. Tony locks his daughter in her room. But the witty girl makes a rope out of the bedclothes and, coming down from her window, lands on her father sleeping below. She escapes, but Tony gives chase. Morris Silverstein is also hot on the trail of his son, Izzy. The young people make good their escape while the fathers come together in a battle royal. The cops join in the fracas and end up by arresting Morris, while Tony goes back to bed. Izzy and Anna are safely married and return to the parental home for the blessing just in time to see Tony's open air bedroom hit by an automobile load of joy riders. Rushing to the wreck they extricate Tony, who, when he finds that they are married, gives them his blessing between sneezes.

SAM AND THE BULLY (Dec. 12).—Sam Johnson is by no means a coward, but he certainly lacks confidence in himself and lets Bully Bill put it all over him. Sam and Bill both love Mattie, or perhaps Bill just butts in to be contrary. In a paper Sam sees an advertisement of the Courage Corporation which professes to teach bravery by mail. He puts up five dollars and sends a letter telling the swindler (who perhaps was not a swindler) what the trouble is. All he gets for his fifty dimes is the assurance that he can kill Bill if he wants to.

Sam thinks that is a great joke and he goes to tell Mattie. On the way he meets Bill and gets another mussing up. Bill enjoys it so much that he follows Sam down to Mattie's and orders him out of her yard. That gets Sam so sore that he commences to believe the letter. He sails in and before the astonished Bill quite realizes the situation, he has been chased up a tree and had his pants pulled off. Sam lays the pants at Mattie's feet as a tropy of love and his cup of joy spills over at the sight of Bill being led off to jail in a barrel. He decides, perhaps, he was not swindled after all. A nice, hardworking laundress is worth five dollars any day.

THE GIRL OF THE OPEN ROAD (Second of the Olive's Opportunities—Dec. 1).—General Coleman, his son and his nephew, were being entertained at the luxurious mountain camp of Mme. Forresti, when one day, while on a mountain tramp, they came upon a gypsy camp just at the moment when Olive was entertaining her companions with the violin. Entranced with the fire of the girl's playing, Mme. Forresti insisted that the girl come to her camp that evening and play for her guests. At first, the gypsy girl refused, but finally relented and promised to come; this decision was particularly pleasing to Vance. That evening Laura Leslie, a young society woman, thoroughly infatuated with Vance Coleman, happened to intercept a glance passed between Olive and the young man.

Her jealousy was immediately aroused to such an extent that when Olive appeared upon the scene she offered to loan her a dress more suitable to the occasion. This act delighted the vanity of the gypsy girl, but she soon found that the styles of to-day were not meant for her, and instead of being made ridiculous in the eyes of the guests, as Laura had planned, she quickly transformed the binding skirt into a fascinating garment by the mere addition of a gypsy scarf, thus frustrating the plan of the young society woman to make her ridiculous in the eyes of Vance.

Drew Martin, Vance's cousin, had overheard General Coleman dictating a new clause in his will to Judge Stone, who had arrived at the camp for this express purpose, and learning that he was to inherit the general fortune in the event of Vance's death, set about bringing things to a focus, as immediate funds were necessary to him. It was after the musicale that Laura Leslie suddenly came upon Vance and Olive on the moonlit terrace of the camp. Making an excuse to get rid of Vance, she set about sowing the seeds of discord by pointing out to Olive the difference in her and Vance's station in life. This so galled the gypsy girl that she fled from the camp.

The following morning, as Vance took his canoe to row across the lake to find Olive, he suddenly discovered that the boat was leaking. Before he could reach shore the tiny craft sunk beneath his weight, leaving him struggling in the water at the base of a cliff with no means at hand with which to save himself. Olive, from the heights above, suddenly discovered his predicament and ran to the gypsy encampment to summon help and to secure a rope. Throwing this to the struggling man, she succeeded in rescuing him from drowning, and aided him to reach the top of the cliff, where he fell exhausted, grateful to the gypsy madcap for her timely aid.

A DOUBLE ELOPEMENT (Dec. 2).—The Smalleys had just moved to town and were receiving the customary courtesy calls from their new neighbors when brother Jack became quite interested in Mrs. Downs, and it soon became evident that his interest was reciprocated. Jack's daughter, May, was away from home, attending a co-educational school, and Mrs. Downs' son, Charlie, was at the same institution. The two young people became acquainted and in time this friendship became more serious.

Meanwhile, both the widow and widower tried to hide the fact that each had a grown child. The courtship was progressing splendidly, and both Jack and Mrs. Smalley were harking back to the days of their youth, when the destruction of the school by fire brought the young people home unexpectedly. Jack was quite surprised at having May appear on the scene, and as Charlie disguised himself in order to fool his mother, and prevailed upon her to go downtown with him to see how many of his old friends would recognize him in a full beard, it so happened that Jack caught sight of them. Thinking that he had a rival, he immediately proposed to the widow and an elopement was decided upon. Charlie and May had decided upon the same means of solving their difficulty, and the two couples met at the train.

Explanations followed and, as a double elopement was decided upon, they all boarded the train together and started off to the city. The rapid action of this comedy, coupled with the splendid character impersonations throughout, gives it a charm all its own, and will insure for it an enthusiastic reception everywhere.

WHO GOES THERE (Special—Two Parts—Dec 4).—When Lieutenant Newman, known as Toppy to all of his friends, brought himself to the point of proposing, and realized that his suit was accepted, he was the most surprised person in the world. Kate knew how very bashful he was, so she took things into her own hands and proposed an elopement, writing him to meet her at Mrs. Hadley's boarding house in the village, near where the military camp was established. Both Lieutenants Upton and Enright planned to elope with their sweethearts, and they also arranged to meet the girls at Mrs. Hadley's.

Kate's scheme worked and Toppy secured his leave, but Upton and Enright were met with a flat refusal when they went to the colonel with a similar request. They were forced to make some arrangement for the girls' protection, however, so they asked Toppy to look out for them. He accepted, little knowing what complications would ensue.

In due time, Gertrude and Grace arrived at the boarding house. Mr. Wilson and Gertrude's guardian had discovered their plans, however, and tried every means to prevent the carrying out of their plans, even going so far as to employ the sheriff of the village. Toppy upset their plans, however, and everything was running smoothly until Tom Wheeler arrived to marry Cousin Julia, and Toppy loaned him a suit of clothes, as he had spoiled his own by falling from his bicycle. Mr. Wilson had secured a warrant for the arrest of a young officer, name unknown, and when the soldiers appeared on the scene it was Wheeler they arrested, he being arrayed in Toppy's uniform. He soon escaped by bribing one of the guards and returned to the house to carry out his wedding plans.

Made desperate by the fact that Kate had arrived, and entirely misconstrued his attentions to the two young women, Toppy dressed himself in the bonnet and gown of Aunt Samantha, whose arrival was momentarily expected, and so planned things that he sent Mr. Wilson and Gertrude's guardian off on a wild goose chase after two boys disguised in the girls' dresses. Everything turned out well in the end, when a minister, hearing the turmoil in the house, entered and was pressed into service to perform the three marriage ceremonies.

IT'S A BEAR (Dec. 5).—Fate must have had a hand in arranging for Weary Willie and Dusty Rhodes to be walking along the road just at the moment when a theatrical trunk bounced from a passing delivery wagon without attracting the attention of the driver. Being accustomed to take advantage of such chances as offered themselves the two knights of the road dragged their find into the bushes, and upon opening it they discovered a complete bear skin and an appropriate uniform for the keeper.

Weary struggled into the skin while Dusty put on the keeper's outfit, and after several rehearsals they started for the summer hotel to levy tribute from the guests for their trained animal act. Leonida Nimrod Buskins was one of the guests, and after trying his charms upon several of the ladies without success he had settled upon Louise Darkin as the one woman in all the world for him. He was in the midst of a well-rehearsed proposal, when she informed him that the man she married would have to be a real hero.

Again Fate meddled and it was Leonida's lot to be the first one to spy the bear. Spurred on by Louise's desire to have him act the hero, he started out to kill the bear, and as he managed to get the two tramps into a tight corner, Weary decided to play possum and rolled over before Leonida could bring himself to shoot. The rest of the party arrived on the scene and Leonida's triumph was complete when the constable appeared, and after taking in the situation demanded his hunting license.

Poor Leonida, beset on all sides, sought a chance of escape. Dusty Rhodes saw his opportunity, and getting him away from the others, he disclosed the truth, threatening to spoil the whole effect of Leonida's heroism unless he handed over his roll of bills. Leonida returned to his companions a poorer but a wiser man, but he was hardly prepared for the reception given him by Louise, who, having discovered that the bear was not real, greeted him with scorn, and left him polishing his engagement ring with the hope of finding further use for it at some later day.

CRYSTALS—THEIR MAKING, HABITS AND BEAUTY (Dec. 7).—The best specimens of crystals are those formed by Nature's own hand from mineral substances, but this picture shows how samples of high beauty can be produced under man's guidance. Incidentally the demonstration is a witness to the harmony and regularity of the laws of nature.

The youthful chemist who is seen gravely at work in the kitchen has selected interesting experiments, and from substances as easily understandable as table salt, epsom salt and gunpowder proceeds to illustrate how azobenzel, toluene nitrate, and other compounds that give the tongue trouble, are very soothing to the eye.

The limitation of the picture to five hundred feet will be regretted by many spectators, who are not content with what is unavoidably only "a snatch of grace beyond the reach of art." But the film shows beauties that will leave those who see it in that very acceptable mental state of wishing that it was at least twice its length.

BUSTER BROWN CAUSES A COMMOTION (Dec. 7).—A mischievous boy, like a good man, can't easily be kept down, and Buster does more than is required to prove it. Buster, Mary Jane and Tige fare forth on their trouble-hunt, and fall in with a neighbor's boy, as bent on pranks as they are. The lad has no difficulty in tempting Buster to try a sneezing powder, and its results are so instant and annoying that Buster buys the boy's supply. Punishment no longer deters him. The satisfaction he and his confederates get out of his tricks counterbalances any form of retribution. Grandpa Brown is an easy victim. Just when he had come to the first big thrill in the book he bought simply because a friend of his had written it, his staring eyes close, his mouth opens and exit sneeze. Mrs. Brown learns the cause and Buster exits likewise, under definite orders from his sneezing mother to a sneezing maid that he go to bed at once. He makes the best of a bad matter by falling asleep, but even his dreams contribute to the disregard of his many powerful resolutions.

That busy little brain of his pictures Grandpa Brown spooning with the maid on a park settee. Buster and the too faithful Tige witness the ardent exchange of affection, and Buster records it with a kodak. He and Tige hotfoot home, where Buster develops the film and astounds his mother with what it reveals. On Grandpa's return, he is shown the telltale picture and, despite its plain evidence, denies it is a likeness of him. He very properly suspects Buster, and pursues the youth over the house and into a bathroom, where Uncle Brown is about to perform a total absolution. Buster opens the door so violently that Uncle Brown is tumbled with clothes on into the filled tub. With quick requital, Grandpa seizes Buster, and as he begins to duck him into the tub, Buster falls out of bed. The tumble awakens him to the need of setting up fresh resolutions, which he knows from experience are, like pie-crust, made to be broken.

THE ROSE AT THE DOOR (Third of Olive's Opportunities—Dec. 8).—By blackmail, Boggs, a thief of plentiful wit and experience, has terrified the profligate nephew of General Coleman into eating out of his hand, and thereby succeeds in obtaining the position of butler in the Coleman home. The crook, overhearing the general tell Vance that in case the latter were to die without heirs the Coleman fortune would go to Drew Martin, informs Martin that he has stuck around longer than he cared to, and that he and his pals need the "long green," and that Martin has to fix it that they get the Coleman money. As Vance and Martin have been invited to spend the week-end at Madame Forresti's country house, the butler details what line of action Martin is to pursue.

On his way to the country manor, Vance meets Olive, the gypsy girl, and she prevails upon him to let her accompany him. In the meanwhile the General dies suddenly of heart failure, and Martin hurries to the Forresti villa to carry out his plans. The presence of Olive stirs the jealousy of Laura, who lets Martin feel how Olive's presence humiliates her. Martin informs her that he has a plan whereby both of them can profit by the humiliation, and, breaking the news of the general's death, promises that, as he is to get the Coleman millions, she is to share them.

That night Laura leaves a rose in front of Vance's door as a sign to the thugs, hired by the butler, where Vance is lodged. When the ruffians steal into the house, they see the rose, enter the room, and in the darkness unknowingly bind, gag and drag off the wrong man, Drew Martin. Olive, curious to learn how a telephone works, had overheard Martin and Laura plan with the butler how to capture Vance, and she removed the rose from Vance's to Martin's door. The thugs bundle Martin into an automobile, and as they are about to cast him into a river he succeeds in loosening the gag and screams who he is. The next morning Madame Forresti, Olive and the nervously expectant Laura are breakfasting when Vance enters. Laura faints and Olive calmly asks for another cup of coffee.

A MATTER OF HIGH EXPLOSIVES (Dec. 9).—Mr. Leonard, a rising young chemist, has invented a remarkable explosive so powerful that a small amount would demolish an entire village. When Mrs. Leonard entered the laboratory one day and learned the nature of this death-lurking compound, she declares against its being made or kept in the house. Her husband tries to reassure her that the explosive is untrustworthy only when mishandled or dropped, but the thought of it haunts the wife day and night, though she fully realizes that by selling the secret of its composition to the government she will soon live on the fat of the land.

Being subject to sleep-walking, Mrs. Leonard enters the laboratory during the early hours of the night, and with extreme caution, makes off with a bomb that she finds on a table. She fares forth into the village, seeking in her sleep a safe spot wherein to deposit the bomb, but by an odd disposition of her sleep-walking fancies, she seeks several roof-tops, whence she is about to cast the bomb, when, using woman's privilege, she changes her mind. As she passes along a lane, two town idlers see her coming, and on closer view, their admiration swiftly veers to feelings of self-preservation when they see that she carries a bomb in her hand. They muster the gossips, who go in nervous search of the sleep-walker, after they have seen fit to rouse Mr. Leonard, and inform him that his wife is out with a "bum." He joins in the pursuit and finds his wife standing on two of the high-power cables near the top of a telegraph pole. In her extended hand, she holds the "bum."

Her husband mounts the telegraph pole, and taking the bomb, shouts to the villagers that he is about to drop it. The villagers scatter briskly, but the chemist knows that the bomb was not loaded with the slaughterous explosive. He, however, has cleared the way to taking his wife home without having gossips to observe him. He puts Mrs. Leonard in bed, and securely ties her to it, thereby insuring himself against further disturbances of his slumber.

THE BEST MAN (Special—Two Parts—Dec. 11).— Shortly before sailing home from Europe, George Hayne had sent Cecilia Jefferson, his American fiancee, the reassuring word that by marrying her he would save her family from financial extremity. To Cecilia's way of thinking and feeling, the marriage is to be only an act of self-immolation. The liner is long overdue, and by the time Hayne reaches his house in a carriage, the bride is waiting at the church. Hayne, in his haste to don his nuptial garments, forgets to set the snap-lock, and finds himself a prisoner in his clothes-closet.

While he was homeward bound, his next-door neighbor Holman, a financial crook, had stolen an important Secret Service cipher message from its bearer. Gordon, a Secret Service agent, is assigned to recover the message, and under the name of John Burnham, contrives to be introduced to Holman as an expert code-reader. At Holman's house, he substitutes a bogus message for the genuine one, and leaves just as Holman discovers the substitution. Gordon sees the carriage in front of Hayne's house, and orders the sleepy driver to take him away quickly. The driver, who has paid small heed to Hayne's identity pays still smaller attention to Gordon's physical make-up, promptly obeys, and knowing that Hayne is to be taken to the church, speeds Gordon thither. In the carriage, Gordon puts on a mustache and an imperial, thereby unconsciously making himself resemble Hayne most closely. At the church, he is mistaken for Hayne, and as duty suggests he goes through the marriage ceremony.

Hayne, after much exertion, frees himself from the clothes-closet, finds his carriage gone, and scurries to the church, where he is informed by the sexton that there was a wedding, but it's over. Gordon and Cecilia start on their honeymoon, and are shadowed by a detective, employed by Holman. In the Pullman, while Cecilia is sleeping, Gordon moves his facial disguise, and is about to enter the smoker when he sees the detective, whose mission he divines. He quickly returns to his berth. Meanwhile, Holman's detective snugly tucks himself in bed, when a defect in the driving-wheel of the engine is discovered. With the train at a standstill, Gordon sees his way to escape with Cecilia. They cautiously leave the Pullman and race wildly down the embankment. Before he can put on his clothes, the train starts, and the detective's errand is abruptly ended. Despite his efforts to prove his identity, Hayne is looked upon as an imposter by the Jeffersons and their friends. Gordon and his wife proceed to Washington, where, for his clever bit of work, he is appointed Chief of the Foreign Secret Service Bureau. This good news and a rapidly acquired love for Gordon bring full content to Cecilia.

THE STENOGRAPHER (Dec. 12).—Gertrude Sawyer supports herself and an invalid sister on her wages as stenographer of a large corporation, but her income does not allow her to fulfil her longing to have her sister seek the remedy of the seaside, or to furnish what conduces to quick recovery. Gertrude's employer, Charles Hardin, has a business rival, Joe Elbert, whom he is anxious to crush. Eager to obtain inside information, Hardin so contrives matters that Gertrude quits his employ and secures a similar position with Elbert. She comes to learn that she is supposed to spy on Elbert and keep Hardin informed of his business secrets. Gertrude is thereby confronted with a terrible alternative. She must either pursue course of action that is dishonorable and repellant, or be thrown out of employment, and thus increase her sister's sufferings, both mental and physical.

The situation is complicated by the fact that Gertrude falls in love with Elbert, and he with her. Unknown to Gertrude, Elbert overhears a stormy interview between her and Hardin, and he thus learns how she is situated. However, he does not let Gertrude understand that he knows how she is placed, but arranges that she -ive false information to Hardin, that drives him to the wall and prospers Elbert. Gertrude, not knowing the trick that Elbert has played, and that through her unconscious aid he has won, remorsefully confesses to him, only to receive his assurance that he knew all about it all the time, understands the situation, and does not resent her part in it.

An overcast sky now clears, and comfort delayed comes to the lovers plentifully. Its fullest measure is for a while withheld, until they watch with delight Gertrude's little sister playing in youthful abandon with the nurse. The story brings into strong relief the economic necessities and moral pitfalls that beset the girl who earns her living, and is told with a directness that forcibly drives its lesson home.

SWEEDIE AND THE HYPNOTIST (Dec. 7).—Sweedie is the scrub lady in the theater. She makes eyes at the stage manager and the hypnotist and is put out of the theater for being so impertinent. Next day while she is out feeding her chickens, she falls asleep and dreams that she has been left an immense fortune by her uncle and that the stage manager and the hypnotist are rivals for her hand. The hypnotist makes her the prima donna of the world and uses his hypnotic influence in keeping his rival out of Sweedie's sight. Finally one day the stage manager sees his chance and pushes the hypnotist into a trunk and locks it. The hypnotist by a few simple motions makes his escape, then lays in wait for the stage manager. Meanwhile Sweedie comes along and is in the act of caressing the hypnotist when she awakes and finds a goat in her lap instead of her ideal.

MRS. TRENWITH COMES HOME (Dec. 8).—Mrs. Trenwith is a typical shallow, thoughtless society woman. Her husband is wrapped up in business and as a result their little daughter, Marjory, suffers greatly from neglect. Her old nurse, Franchette, loves her dearly. Mr. Trenwith leaves town on a business trip while his wife goes to a house party, where she meets Ralph Eccles, a typical society tempter. She leads him on. Shortly after she receives a telegram that Marjory is ill and asks for her constantly. She thinks nothing of the message and makes no preparation to leave. Then her conscience begins to work and she dashes for the first train home, only to find Marjory unconscious. Eccles follows and insists upon seeing her. For the first time she tells him that she is married and refuses to see him. Mr. Trenwith arrives just in time to see the child open her eyes, and for the first time they realize what selfish creatures they are.

THE FABLE OF THE BUSH LEAGUE LOVER WHO FAILED TO QUALIFY (Dec. 9).—Homer Splivens was a Loud Noise among the boys, but with the girls he was the dampest bomb that ever dropped from an airship. He seldom went to see a girl, but it wasn't his fault, they refused to make dates with him. Finally he saw Lucy Livingston and fell for her. He didn't have the nerve to ask to call on her, although he was just dying to. He read the lives of all the lady killers to see how they got away with it, then called on Lucy. He tried to tell her his love but he flattened out like a dying welsh rarebit. He then decided to study the actions of the more modern wooers like the movie idol, Francis X. Bushman. He also had an interview with Jack Thompson, who was an awful hit with women. The next expedition for the capture of Lucy started out with flying colors. He forgot what Jack

Shortly after his father has a quarrel with a surveyor, who refuses to stop trespassing on his property. Broncho's dad shoots him. The wounded man's pal rushes to Broncho Billy's office and demands that he arrest his father. After some hesitation Broncho remembers his father's parting words, and decides to do his duty. When he goes to his home, the old man threatens to shoot him, but is prevented by his mother. He at last consents to go to jail. After locking him safely in a cell, Broncho resigns as sheriff. Meanwhile the wounded man has regained consciousness and writes a note to Broncho telling him that his father fired in self-defense. Broncho is overjoyed and hastens to the jail where he breaks the glad news to his dad.

EVERY INCH A KING (Special—Two Parts—Dec. 11).—King Livian is determined to crush the neighboring King Leofric and seize the kingdom of Vidonia. He fears a direct attack because of threats by larger powers. Leofric is much opposed to war because of the hardships on his people, so when Livian makes a proposal to him that if he will marry his niece, Princess Irmingarde, he will refrain from war, he readily agrees, although he is already in love with a beautiful American heiress, Elba Allen.

Irmingarde, as queen, plots with King Livian. When the time is ripe, she conspires with Kevan, a spy for Livian in Leofric's court to demand half of the kingdom in her own right. She sends a note telling Livian of this, and tells him to prepare to strike at any moment. Leofric intercepts the note. He accuses the queen of treachery and divorces her under an ancient law. In the meantime Elba Allen has disappeared. The queen also was jealous of her beauty, and sent her a poisoned fan with a note saying it was a present from the king. She is overcome by the fumes and thrown into a dunugeon while unconscious.

Walton, an American newspaper correspondent, who is a friend of Elba, discovers the fan and note and accuses the king. The king shows him the letter is in the handwriting of the queen. The queen is then led to a dungeon, where Elba is discovered by the guards and released. King Leofric has gone to the frontier in answer to a message from Livian, who sends him an ultimatum after he hears from Kevan of the frustration of the plot.

Leofric is attacked by Livian's men and fights valiantly until a corps of U. S. marines, summoned by Walton when he found that the American girl was missing, arrives. They join forces with Leofric and quickly defeat Livian. Elba, when released, asked for the king. She is told the facts and immediately mounts a horse and rushes to the frontier to be with him. She arrives just as Livian is repulsed and is hailed as the new queen.

BUD, BILL AND THE WAITER (Dec. 1).—All goes well with Bud, who is courting Mildred, until his big brother, Bill, meets the girl. Then Mildred forgets all about Bud. Bill proceeds to spend his entire allowance on the girl he has stolen from his brother.

While in an ice cream parlor with Mildred, Bill finds a fly in his dish. His indignant complaint results in the dismissal of Ham, the waiter who had served him. Anxious to relocate his patron, the proprietor of the place allows Bill to depart without paying.

This gives Bill an idea. When he takes Mildred out to dine that evening, he has a fly or two tucked away in his vest pocket. It happens that Ham has landed a job in the restaurant and again is fired when Bill puts his trick over.

Meanwhile, Bud, desperate at the thought of losing his sweetheart, plans Bill's downfall. The boy writes to six of his brother's former sweethearts, requesting them to be at Wrector's the following night at eight. Bill has arranged to take Mildred to that fashionable eating emporium.

Ham has just secured a position in Wrector's when he sees Bill and Mildred enter. Thirsting for revenge, Ham notifies the manager of Bill's scheme. Shortly afterward, Bill is astounded when the six girls drop in and join him. His heart almost stops beating when the bill is finally presented. He tries the fly trick, but this time it fails to work.

Mildred is furious. Bud has witnessed all that has transpired from an adjoining table. Mildred welcomes him effusively when he strolls over. Bud pays the bill, laughs at Bill and walks out in triumph with his sweetheart.

THE PRODIGAL (Special—Two Parts—Dec. 2).—His insolent attentions repulsed by Violet, a country girl, Howard Gordon follows the maid into the little church, where she is to rehearse with the village choir. The simple hymn Violet sings awakens Gordon's better nature and he later apologizes for his conduct.

Although all thought of the man passes from Violet's mind, Gordon thinks of her constantly in the months which follow. Marie, an adventuress who has been endeavoring to ensnare the man, finds him proof against her wiles. Some time afterward, Violet secures a position in the city with a large concern. Not until she sees Gordon at his desk in the president's office, does she realize that he is her employer.

Deply in love with her, the man asks Violet to be his wife. Although Violet returns his love, she rejects his suit. Several days later Gordon induces Violet to attend a dinner which he is giving to some friends. To Violet's intense amazement, he suddenly proposes a toast to her as his future wife. Mistaking the girl's silence, the guests shower her with congratulations.

Thus Violet is virtually compelled to marry Gordon. Marie resolves to separate the two and due to her influence, Gordon drinks heavily. Violet, in despair, returns to her home in the country. Gordon then realizes the result of his conduct. Stricken with remorse, he renounces his career of dissipation and hastens to the country to beg his wife's forgiveness. The man finds Violet in the little church. He seats himself by her side. The kindly preacher's discourse softens Violet's heart and a reconciliation is effected.

THE DEVIL AND MRS. WALKER (Dec. 4).—Many things happen on the night that Mrs. Walker, who rules her husband and daughter with an iron rod, is invited to address the Shoestring Makers' Union. First, her daughter Ethel takes advantage of the opportunity to elope with her sweetheart, Gustave Henri. The latter is the son of Mrs. Walker's despised neighbors. Second, instead of washing the dishes, Mr. Walker steals away to a masquerade ball in devil's attire.

Mrs. Walker discovers her hubby's absence when she returns home. She waits for him with rolling pin in hand. When Walker finally steals into the house, his wife is scared speechless by what she thinks is his Satanic Majesty. Realizing the situation, Walker, as the devil, warns his wife that she is to treat her husband kindly in the future.

The following day Mrs. Walker lavishes attention upon her husband. Shortly afterward, Ethel and her newly acquired husband return home for parental blessings. Instead, Walker yanks his daughter into the house and kicks Gustave into the street. A messenger boy arrives with a message for Walker. Gustave gets the telegram. It is from the organization which held the ball. Walker is informed that he has been awarded first prize.

THE STOLEN ENGINE (Fourth of "The Hazards of Helen Series"—Dec. 5).—Tom O'Grady, section foreman, is discharged when the carelessness of one of his men brings about the derailment of the Beaumont Local. While disconsolately trudging down the track, the old man comes upon a valuable package lost from the express car of the Almont Flyer. At the same moment, Helen, telegrapher at Quarry, receives a wire from the express messenger, requesting her to institute a search for the package.

Later, Helen comes upon O'Grady just after the man has been knocked unconscious by Durham and Keeson, yeggmen. Stealing the package, the crooks hold up the crew of a freight engine and compel the engineer to send his locomotive ahead at full speed. Learning O'Grady's story, Helen climbs into the cab of a locomotive standing on a siding. At her order, Duncan, the engineer, takes up the chase. Traveling on a parallel track, they overtake the freight engine. When alongside of the stolen engine Helen leaps into it from her locomotive, although a slip means a horrible fate. She attacks the robbers, taking them by surprise. A wrench hurled by Duncan, stuns Durham. Keeson is subdued by Helen and the engine crew. The brave girl recovers the package, and her story results in O'Grady's reinstatement.

Duncan falls madly in love with Helen and asks her to marry him. But Helen, whose next Hazard will be released, Saturday, December 12th, has no intention of marrying for some time to come.

THE PRICE OF SILENCE (Special—Two Parts—Dec. 7).—Trouble fostered by Bill Leets, in the secret employ of a business rival, results in a strike which ruins Tom Plank, head of an industrial plant. Upon learning that the boy has lost his wealth, Clara, his fiancee, returns his ring.

Leets loves Barbara Ragan. Before the crash, Tom had become interested in the girl. Shortly afterward, the girl's father encounters Hegel, formerly the factory foreman. Deadly hatred exists between the two. Tom, who chances to pass, sees Ragan slay his foe.

Tom follows the murderer home. Knowledge that his crime is known fills the old man with terror. Tom then learns that Barbara is Leets' sweetheart. Believing the girl to have had a hand in bringing about his ruin, he announces that the price of his silence is that Barbara wed him and share the poverty she had brought upon him. Although Leets is frantic, Barbara, to save her father, consents.

Husband and wife live in sullen silence, although each secretly grows to love the other. Fortune smiles upon Tom and he regains his former wealth. Shortly afterward, Barbara's father is killed in an explosion. Tom's hold upon her is thus removed.

Leets believes that Barbara still loves him. The man boldly enters the Plank mansion while Tom is giving a dinner to some friends. Believing that her husband hates her, Barbara announces her intention of departing with Leets. Just as she is about to leave the house the enormity of the offense dawns upon the wife and she shrinks from Leets with horror. She rushes back to her room, where she finds Tom with head buried in his arms. Then, for the first time, the two realize the depths of each other's love.

In his effort to escape, Tom Smith, the referee, jumps through the window. He lands in a barrel of water. Jones finds him there. He offers to take Smith home with him and tog him up in dry clothes. Mrs. Jones is in bed when the two enter. Unknown to Bill and his friend, they have been trailed by the sheriff.

Bill fools the officer for a time by imitating a woman's voice. Mrs. Jones, awakened by the sound, comes downstairs. Bill barely has time to shove Smith behind a screen. He gets out of the scrape by declaring he was rehearsing a part for which he has been cast in a play to be given by his lodge. Satisfied with this explanation, Mrs. Jones retires to her room.

Bill almost gets caught a second time, but again escapes by the skin of his teeth. Smith finally escapes through the back door a moment before Mrs. Jones enters once more. She comes just as the sheriff, bursting down the door, goes headlong through the screen. Pouncing upon the sheriff, Bill and his wife maul the poor man until he gladly pays for the damage he has caused. With the retreat of the discomfited officer, Jones protectingly places his arms about his better half and breathes a sigh of relief.

THE MYSTERY OF THE YELLOW SUNBONNET (Special—Two Parts—Dec. 9).—George Cathcart, a young naval officer, arrives home on leave of absence after months of mine planting service. Major Maynard, a foreign spy, occupies the adjoining estate. With the assistance of Jessica, an adventuress, Maynard plans to obtain the maps in Cathcart's possession.

Jessica contrives to become the guest of George's mother. Although he falls in love with her, the naval officer is led to suspect the girl. He removes the maps from his desk, hiding them behind a secret panel. When Jessica later rifles the desk, she obtains worthless maps.

George has seen a yellow sunbonnet hanging in the hall of Maynard's home. The officer is later mystified when he finds a paper, lost by Jessica, bearing the legend, "the yellow sunbonnet." The two visit Maynard that evening. After they have gone, the spy unscrews the peg from which the sunbonnet hangs. The peg is hollow and contains the maps which Jessica had stolen.

The adventuress has fallen madly in love with George and when informed by Maynard that the maps she had secured are worthless, refuses to aid him further. A clever ruse perpetrated by Maynard reveals to him the hiding place of the genuine maps. Jessica, however, makes this discovery first. When Maynard opens the secret panel, he finds a note in which Jessica tells him that she has the maps and, because of her love for George, intends to place them into the latter's hands.

George comes upon th spy. Jessica enters the room just as Maynard attempts to shoot the naval officer. The girl leaps forward and receives the bullet intended for George. Maynard escapes. Jessica's wound proves slight and she becomes George's wife.

THE BOLD BANDITTI AND THE RAH RAH BOYS (Dec. 11).—Poor Percival Butterfingers is the butt of all the pranks played by Billy Stout and his chums. The arrival at college of Ralph, a freshman, diverts attention from Percy. Just before Ralph appears, Billy receives a letter from the boy's brother, requesting that some of Ralph's conceit be taken out of him.

As luck would have it, Ralph and Professor Nutt overhear Billy and his chums concoct a blackhand scheme. At the same time, a real gang of blackhanders plan to blow up Ralph's room to square a fancied wrong against his wealthy father. One of the blackhanders enters Ralph's room with a bomb, whereupon the boy, believing him to be a student in disguise, beats him up and chases him away.

The bomb dropped by the blackhander sputters on the floor. Carelessly picking it up, Ralph throws it out of the window just as Billy and his crew arrive. The bomb explodes, knocking the boys over and wrecking the building. Police and faculty members are attracted to the scene. In their effort to escape, the conspirators run into the real blackhand artists and a battle royal takes place.

When the police arrive, they arrest Billy

A RELIC OF THE OLDEN DAYS (Nov. 21).—Out for a stroll, the little girl finds a stone hammer and asks her father what it is. Coyote Bill proceeds to tell her of the days when the stone hammer was the only means of defense.

Weak Hands, feeling the pangs of hunger, leaves his cave in search of food. White Flower, a girl of a neighboring tribe, is courted by Strong Arms. She hates him and runs away. She meets Weak Hands, who has just pounced on a rabbit. He offers it to her. She accepts. The act, according to the custom of the time, constitutes their marriage. So they go to Weak Hands' cave, where they prepare to cook the rabbit.

Brute Force, scenting fresh food, enters Weak Hands' cave and obtains the rabbit. He sees White Flower and drives Weak Hands away. Weak Hands returns. Brute Force pursues. Meanwhile Strong Arms has traced White Flower and dragged her from the cave. Brute Force, standing over the prostrate Weak Hands, is just about to put an end to him with his stone hammer when he chances to see Strong Arms dragging White Flower away. He gives chase. The two men fight. White Flower hastens back to the cave, to which Weak Hands also drags himself.

Fighting furiously, Strong Arms and Brute Force fall over a high cliff. Weak Hands and White Flower, unmolested, resume their primitive wedding feast.

But all this, Coyote Bill tells his little daughter, happened thousands and thousands of years ago.

THE MOCCASIN PRINT (Nov. 28).—Madge is in love with Joe, though her love is not returned. Joe tells her that he could never think of her but as a mere friend. Madge insists. When Helen and her mother and father arrive in the village, Joe is the first to meet them. He offers to show them a place to locate.

Time passes. Joe has fallen deeply in love with Helen, who also looks favorably on him. Madge, who has noticed Joe's attachment, is jealous. She decides to get Helen out of the way. Disguising herself as an Indian, she comes upon Helen while the latter is getting water at a spring. She compels Helen to go with her. She fastens her to a tree, and then proceeds to find Joe. After again being spurned, she goes home.

Evening comes on. Helen's parents and Joe search for her, but without success. The following day, Madge, in disguise, goes to look after her prisoner. She passes Joe and a crowd of cowboys who are lingering at the village store. Joe recognizes in her footprints the same footprints that he noticed at the spring the day previous. He follows and comes upon her just as she is about to shoot Helen. He rescues Helen and sends Madge on her way. We later see Madge asking forgiveness at the altar.

SAMMY'S VACATION (Nov. 24).—Sammy receives a letter from his sweetheart telling him to come to the summer resort. He hurries to the station. On arriving at Bumville, Sammy is greeted by his sweetheart, who introduces him to one of the boarders. His sweetheart goes in for a book. Meanwhile, Gladys, the boarder, is flirting with Sammy. Carrie returns. They decide to find a shady nook in the woods. Gladys also takes a book and walks to a spot close to where Sammy and Carrie are. Gladys attracts Sammy's attention. She invites him over. He crawls to her on his hands and knees. They are having a nice conversation when Carrie misses her "man."

Joe, Gladys' friend, discovers Henry with Gladys. Then he sees Carrie later. Sammy sees Joe hugging Carrie. A battle ensues. There is a hair-pulling match between the ladies. Gladys and Joe go to the Justice of the Peace and have "some" cops sent on Sammy's trail. Over roof tops and down chimneys the chase continues. Sammy is captured. He is placed in jail. Later, he is released. His sweetheart gives him a letter. It is from his employer, stating that his services are no longer required as he has overstayed his vacation.

VIVIAN'S COOKIES (Dec. 8).—The Bull Moosers decide to offer Mr. Piffle a nomination for alderman. Arriving at Piffle's home they are cordially welcomed and introduced to his wife. Vivian prepares a little treat for her husband's friends, which treat is in the form of cookies. She invites them out to the dining room. Tea is served and everything goes along very nicely until the cookies are served. Each in turn takes a piece of cake. Dave, when asked to have another, puts it in his pocket. None of the men approves of the cookies. After they have finished, they start for home. On the way Dave gets a sudden attack of cramps, and is almost doubled up with the acute pain. Joe is also seriously ill and has to be carried home by Bill. Dave, after being questioned, tells a policeman he has been poisoned. The cop summons a little boy who is playing with a child's express wagon and places Dave in the cart. Being too big for the wagon, Dave soon upsets it. Bill, becoming tired, accidentally lets Joe fall into a barrel. Shortly after this Vivian is summoned to court. Standing before the judge, Vivian pleads innocent of trying to poison the men. Dave offers the judge a cake. The latter is soon in great agony. Her husband pays the fine and he and his wife return home. Later they receive a letter stating Mr. Piffle need no longer consider himself nominated for Alderman.

WHOSE BABY? (Dec. 8).—After kissing her baby and warning the nurse to be careful of him, Mrs. Skinney enters her home. Her husband enters and shows her an article which states that the city officials are to have a meeting to devise a plan to prevent kidnapping. Being worried about her child's safety she decides to get him. She finds the nurse reading and the baby picking flowers a short distance away. The following day baby is taken out for a walk and the nurse is again warned not to leave him for an instant. Mother then decides to give the girl a scare, thus teaching her a lesson. She plans to kidnap her own child. The nurse takes out her book and begins to read. In a little while a friend comes up to her and they stroll off, leaving the child alone. The mother comes out from behind some bushes and picks up the child. She covers the baby and walks away to see where the nurse has gone to. A little boy who has been picking berries finds the child and takes it home to his mother. The nurse girl, remembering her duty, quickly returns to the bench she previously occupied. She is alarmed to find the child gone. The girl becomes anxious and starts to search for the child. The mother returns and almost collapses when she finds the child has been taken. After a great deal of excitement is caused the baby is found, the nurse is forgiven and each is reconciled to the other.

THE HEIRESS AND THE CROOK (Two Parts Nov. 25).—The story opens when a bogus count comes to America to make a rich marriage. He is introduced into society and, incidentally, to the family of a rich manufacturer. This manufacturer's wife is somewhat of a parvenu; she has ambitions for her daughter, the season's debutante. The girl, however, is courted by a young American lawyer and resists her mother's efforts to throw her into the arms of the pseudo nobleman. In order to impress the shallow mother, the nobleman enlists the aid of a spiritualist charlatan. This fellow invokes the spirit aid of a supposed ancestor, who is instructed to state that the girl is predestined to marry a nobleman of distinction.

Shortly after this, the girl meets the count and, what with the aid of the mother, he leads her into the seance. The girl is impressed and when the supposed spirit delivers its message, she is about ready to give her consent to marry the nobleman.

In the household of the manufacturer there is a little slavey, who is devoted to her mistress. This slavey is also engaged to the policeman on the beat. She overhears, of an evening, the plot which the bogus count is endeavoring to formulate with the medium. She informs both the young lawyer and her policeman lover. The two men see the necessity of acting quickly to defeat the count's bold scheme. They find out, through some unusually clever detective work, just what the count is trying to "put over;" also they learn where the final seance is to be held. Accompanied by the little slavey, the policeman and the lawyer managed to make their way into the cellar and overpower the fellow, who is to masquerade as the spirit, without arousing the rest of the household. The little slavey, under the instructions of the men, disguises herself as the spirit and prepares to play the role herself.

In the room above, the victims are gathered strangely together, waiting for the "appearance." The charlatan gives the command; the spirit comes forth. But instead of delivering its message, as previously instructed, it denounces the schemers, the bogus count included. Immediately following, the lawyer and the policeman, assisted by other policemen, break into the house and round up the criminals.

The parvenu mother and the father, after they have been returned home safely, are thoroughly disillusioned, and, of course, the young lawyer wins his bride, while the little slavey is properly taken care of.

FOR THE MASTERY OF THE WORLD (Three Parts—Dec. 9). Mr. Grimm, a clever detective of the United States Secret Service, receives the news to the effect that Rosa Morini, a noted adventuress and spy, is negotiating for the sale of a wireless bomb apparatus which can be operated at a distance of 3,000 miles and will make its possessor absolutely the master of the world's power.

Shortly after receiving this news, Prince Morini, Rosa's brother, is arrested. He receives a note from Pietro, the inventor of the bomb, and while purporting to be an innocent note, it is written in invisible ink and warns Rosa to be on guard and to act quickly in the sale of the apparatus. Through her acquaintance with the daughter of the French ambassador the adventuress gains admittance to the Italian legation. The following day she presents herself at the club and upon flashing the King's ring, of which she has a clever duplicate, receives the utmost courtesy and attention.

Grimm has traced her to the Italian legation and determines to make an arrest. He has received orders to see that the Prince and Rosarre deported from the country at once. Disguised as an Italian by a pre-arranged plan, he effects the arrest of Rosa and the Prince and tells them they must leave the country at once. While riding to the boat, Rosa becomes aware of his identity and manages to send a wire to the captain of the boat stating that the officials blundered in arresting Prince Marini and his sister and that they are to be released. As soon as they reach the pier, the captain, who has received the wire, apologizes and they are freed.

Shortly afterwards Grimm comes upon them in a restaurant and by a subterfuge Rosa manages to poison his coffee. He is carried out by the Prince and left bound and gagged. Pietro, the inventor of the wireless bomb, is told if a test is satisfactory the apparatus would be purchased that night by two great world powers and a test arranged for. When Grimm recovers his senses he finds a note left by Rosa bidding him good-bye. His already awakened admiration for the girl's cleverness ripens into love and he decides to save her from herself. Freeing himself from his bonds, he again gets on the trail and follows the Prince and Rosa in a taxicab to the scene of the test. In his excitement the Prince ventures too close and the explosion kills him, while under the nervous strain of the test, Pietro dies of heart failure. Grimm leads the girl away from the scene of the explosion into, it is expected, a newer and better life.

THE MOUNTAIN TRAITOR (Dec. 13).—Joe Selby, the handsome but shy young clerk of the village store in a little mining town, has never given a second's thought to any girl until one day he waits upon Ruth, the winsome daughter of an old prospector who has recently come to live in the mountains. In his shy and diffident manner, the young fellow pays ardent court to the girl and their romance grows. A band of moonshiners with a still far up in the mountains have been giving the revenue officers much concern. After serving a term in prison, Sid, nephew of Dan Clayton, leader of the illicit distillers, returns and in his evil way falls desperately in love with the pretty Ruth. The illegal whiskey trade goes on and, to the girl's sorrow, her father is initiated into the mysteries of moonshining. One day Sid asks Mason for the hand of his daughter, but the old man, cherishing her as his one and dearest possession, refuses to force Ruth into a marriage which he knows is distasteful to the innocent mountain lass. Beyond himself at the old miner's attitude, the degenerate Sid resolves to get even. He makes his way to the revenue officer's quarters and makes known the whereabouts of his uncle's still. It happens young Selby's duties take him to the house next door, and he overhears the betrayal. Determined his sweetheart's father and her happiness shall not be sacrificed, he runs to the moonshiner's "hideout," where he is captured by the revenue officers. After dark days in jail, his trial comes up and prominent in the courtroom is the traitor, drunk from whiskey made by his own hands. At the height of the trial Ruth leaves the room for air and overhears Sid bragging drunkenly of what he has done. After a struggle he is captured and, while Joe is freed, Clayton is led to a cell. Arm in arm, Joe and Ruth are seen crossing the mountain to a new happiness, while Ruth's father gives up his lawless occupation to live with his new son-in-law.

BILLY'S CHARGE (Dec. 7).—Billy's mamma leaves him in charge of the baby, after giving each a slice of bread and jam. Billy leaves the baby to take a stroll with Carmen and Chandler through the woods. The baby wanders off to the edge of the lake. Meantime, Billy and Chandler find a bird's nest, which they steal. Upon showing it to Carmen she becomes angry and demands they replace the nest in the tree, telling the boys that God will not like it if they steal it.

Chandler, knowing he has displeased Carmen, tries to win her favor by placing the nest back in the tree, pretending he is hurt in falling down. The plan works well and all are happy again. Billy suddenly remembers the baby and goes back to look for her. He finds her missing. Then later, finding the baby's shoe at the edge of the lake, Billy becomes terribly frightened. The baby has been saved from falling into the water by a strange dog. Later, Billy, in deep despair, finds the lost child guarded by the dog. Filled with joy, he succeeds in getting the child back home just as his mother comes to look for them. After mother takes the baby, Billy wipes the perspiration from his brow and resolves never to leave that kid alone again.

HIS NEW JOB (Dec. 10).—Mabel, a new arrival at the hotel, is annoyed by the attention of Arthur, a flirt, and Mr. Stue, both guests at the same place. Deciding to leave, she goes to her room to pack her trunk. Mr. Stue follows. She takes refuge in the room across the hall. Hearing footsteps, she hides under the bed; the owner of the room, who happens to be Arthur, enters. Noodles, the porter, is sent up to Mabel's room to bring down her trunk. Upon finding Mr. Stue in possession, a fight starts. Mr. Stue is thrown into Arthur's room. He rolls under the bed and is delighted to find Mabel there. He is dragged forth and in the free-for-all fight Mabel escapes and Stue falls into her trunk and is made a prisoner by Noodles, who performs his mission by falling down the steps with the trunk. The trunk bursts open and Mr. Stue pops out decorated with different pieces of lingerie. It winds up with Stue and Noodles falling into the fountain, where Stue falls peacefully to sleep.

THE ADVENTURES OF THE NIMBLE DOLLAR (Dec. 11).—Confidence and Dollar are lovers. Their warm friend is Dr. Optimism, who aids them in every way. This genial fellow keeps merchants, farmers, and the people in happiness and health. But the three friends have a bitter, bitter enemy in Pessimism, the bandit who would rob the world of all good. Pessimism and his band of ugly glooms invades the market places, filling every corner with woe. Then he goes about among the farmers and instills fear that crops will not be good. Dr. Optimism and Miss Confidence bring Dollar into the parts of trade and business activity is restored. Then Pessimism and his glooms set upon Dollar and capture him. They are dragging him away to the dungeon, Money Vault, when Confidence declares that she cannot live without Dollar and will go with him. The glooms lock the pair in the vault and Pessimism and his army go forth to bring ruin. They engage the services of Panic and wander through the country.

Dollar is paralyzed by inactivity and Confidence is dying, when Dr. Optimism consults the oracle, "Past Experience." "Smile and Boost" advises the oracle; Optimism seeks to reassure trade. He is only partly successful, for trade is dormant when Dollar is in prison. Besides, Pessimism is sneaking through the mart. Finally, Optimism raises an army of joys and they attack Pessimism and the glooms. To Trade is given the task of firing the gun of Civic. Trade is dormant. He hangs his head, thinking all is lost. The battle is raging and the joys of their leader are being drowned, when the spirit of Confidence comes to dormant Trade and rouses him. Confidence fires the gun and Pessimism falls over, dead. The glooms are routed and Optimism and his cohorts attack the money vault and release Confidence and Dollar, now almost deaf. A dose of the elixir of Optimism and Business activity completely restores the pair. Down vacant streets they hurry, Dollar nimbly turning summersaults and touching with his magic wand the racked houses and stores. All changes and the city's streets are teeming with busy life. Dollar goes into the barren desert. A few nimble turns and maneuvers, and desert is blooming with garden and fruit trees.

THE WIDOW'S LAST (Dec. 8).—Crusty and crabbed, the old shoemaker hates the children of the neighborhood, who in turn plague him at every opportunity. One day while playing ball in the street the old man's shop window is smashed. The guilty ones escape the wrath they have aroused. One of the boys, however, is caught when pushed against the cobbler and is soundly punished. His mother, on hearing his story of the beating he received, hastens to the shop and takes back the shoes she had sent to be repaired. The next day she discovers that the old man has given her two "rights" and no "left" and her ire is equalled by her haste to tell the boot-mender what she thinks of his carelessness. But she finds him ill and her womanly pity is aroused. Calling her son she sends him for the nearby doctor and thereupon sets about tidying up the dirty back room of the shop. Through the sickness the widow proves her genuineness and nurses the old bachelor back to health. And the inevitable occurs—for sympathy is corraled by Dan Cupid—and thus the widow's "last" proves her best.

THEIR UPS AND DOWNS (Dec. 11).—Eddie and his wife live at the top of the Angel's Flight inclined railway. The music master, who gives Eddie's wife piano lessons lives at the bottom. He calls to give her a lesson and Eddie becomes jealous and has a quarrel with the professor. Eddie's wife later gets the same car, taking the professor down, which passes the other car with Eddie coming up. He sees his wife going down with the professor in the other car and upon reaching the top, tries to get the attendant to start the car down again right away, but is unsuccessful. He then bundles down the stairway at the side of the incline as fast as he can. His wife below finds she has forgotten her purse and takes the car going up. When Eddie reaches the bottom, the professor tells him his wife has gone up the incline. He then boards the car going up and sees his wife in the other car going down, she having by this time secured her purse.

At the bottom she meets the professor, who tells her of her husband's crazy actions. She is afraid to go up alone and so the professor accompanies her up the stairs. Eddie meanwhile has taken the car going down and passes them again, being unable to reach them. Upon reaching the bottom he dashes up the steps after them. Arriving home, wifie and the professor find Eddie is not there and she asks the professor to play something, which he obligingly does. Eddie reaches the house and chases the professor out at the point of his revolver, but the professor finally escapes and Eddie makes up with his wife. The professor vows to have nothing more to do with the crazy couple living at the top of the flight, while Eddie procures canned music for his wife, via the paper rolls and a piano-player.

THE RURAL DEMONS (Dec. 13).—Billie and Henry, demons of love and jealousy, are both in love with the beautiful daughter of a well-to-do farmer. Sight of one of the demons by the other in the company of the girl is the high sign for battle. Eggs, bricks or any weapon at hand are made use of in their encounters. Billie scores when he manages to elope with the girl in Henry's "auter."

Father's chat with his friend, the sheriff, is rudely broken into by the outraged Henry, and the chase after the runaways starts. Unluckily a tire gives out, but finding himself in front of a tire factory, Billie proceeds to order direct to consumer. Not having the size, the superintendent finally agrees to make it for the persistent Billie, who finally urges forward each process of manufacture personally.

Henry, father, the sheriff and constables, hot on the trail, arrive before the completion of the tire. Henry is further infuriated by the ruin of his tire and spanks the girl. Billie, loathe to part with the price of the tire, but compelled to do so in order to get away, finds the chasers surrounding the automobile when he rushes forth. Realizing he has lost out with the girl and "auter" he tries to recover his money. This the superintendent objects to and the argument that follows ends in blows. The chasers arrive in the midst of the fracas and lend a hand—to the triumph of Henry.

THE LITTLE GRAY HOME (Two Parts—Dec. 11).—David and Anne are content in their little gray home in the country. David writes and Anne busies herself about in her little garden. One day Madame Devere happens along in her motor and stops at the little gray home. She sees David, reads the play he has just completed and believes that it will be a success. David is also handsome and the woman becomes infatuated with him.

It turns out later that the play is a masterpiece, and when David closes the home to go to the city to produce the play, Anne is sore at heart. At rehearsals she sits demurely in the corner and watches her husband at his work. Her quiet, modest way attracts the attention of Dane Elwin, a wealthy clubman, and during David's busy days, several times he escorts her home.

Meantime the wily actress has succeeded in gaining his infatuation and he forgets Anne. Heartbroken, Anne steals back to the little gray home, leaving David to believe she has gone to visit friends.

Impressed by Anne's goodness, Dane decides to save her husband, and so he throws himself at Madame Devere, who has long been trying to attract him. He so awakens David to the kind of woman he is dealing with, that David becomes disgusted. Upon receiving a letter from his friends whom he thought Anne was visiting, telling him she has not been there, David thinks of her love for the little gray home. He leaves the city. At the little gray home he finds Anne, where she has been waiting daily for him to return.

THE INN OF THE WINGED GOD (Third of the "Terrence O'Rourke, Gentleman Adventurer" Series — Two Parts — Dec. 7). — Terrence O Rourke, soldier of fortune, is in love with the Princess de Grandlieu, one of the most wealthy women in France. She, too, loves him. ORourke, a poor man, refuses to marry her until he has made a fortune of his own, and he departs to seek it. Before leaving, he breaks a franc piece in two, telling her that should she ever need him, to send the other half of the franc and he would come at once.

Adolph Chambret, a friend of O'Rourke's, and at one time in love with the Princess, receives a letter from one of his former sweethearts, Delphine, Duchess of Lutzemburg. The letter tells him her son, who is the heir to the throne, has been abducted and she suspects the younger brother of her former husband of being implicated in it, as he would ascend the throne should the boy disappear. She implores Chambret to come to her, and Chambret agrees and gets O'Rourke to go with him, sending her word to meet them at the Inn of the Winged God, on Thursday next. The Duchess receives his note, and disguising herself as a peasant woman, goes to the Inn to meet them. Her maid, a confederate of the Prince's, divulges her plans to him, and he plots to capture both Chambret and O'Rourke. O'Rourke, leaving Chambret and his automobile miles down the road, goes to the Inn by himself. There he meets Delphine disguised as a bar maid, and not recognizing her, starts a mild flirtation. The Prince and his lieutenant arrive and insult Delphine. O'Rourke takes her part and in an instant is engaged in a broad sword duel with the Prince. Delphine makes her escape and the Prince, master of the broadsword, is giving O'Rourke the fight of his life.

Chambret arrives just in time to keep the Prince's companion from shooting O'Rourke. The Prince drives O'Rourke into a corner and is about to kill him, when a secret panel in the wall opens and Delphine pulls O'Rourke into darkness and safety. They come out on a small hill across from the Inn, and as they look back they see Chambret getting away in his car and exchanging shots with the Prince and his companion. O'Rourke endeavors to thank Delphine and she divulges her identity to him. They start for the hunting lodge, where she has her other clothes. Later, Chambret is captured by troopers of the Prince and taken to the hunting lodge. Delphine and O'Rourke arrive and are also captured.

The Prince, thinking himself an expert with the sword, tells O'Rourke and Chambret that in a gentleman's way he intends to kill them both, and he proceeds. They fight and O'Rourke proves to be the better man with the rapier. The Prince, to save his life, tells him where the child is hidden, but when O'Rourke has given him his mercy, the Prince attempts treachery and O'Rourke kills him. O'Rourke tells the Duchess of the whereabouts of her child, and she is full of gratitude and love for him, and attempts to embrace him, and he forgetting for an instant, takes her in his arms. A vision appears of his friend Chambret on one side and Princess Beatrix on the other. He breaks away from her and starts on his way to further adventure.

THE TRAIL BREAKERS (Two Parts—Dec. 12).—Rex de Roselli is president of the D. & H. Railroad. In his employ, as private secretary, is William Clifford. Roselli has a daughter, Marie, between whom and Clifford there is a decided love interest, though this is unknown to Roselli, who hopes Marie will accept the attention of Sherman Bainbridge, a director and stockholder in the D. & H.

The C. & D., a rival railroad, is about to parallel the D. & H. system. Knowing this action will cut into the profits of his road, Roselli invites Bainbridge to discuss the matter with him. The conference takes place in the library of the Roselli home and follows a dinner at which are present Clifford, Bainbridge, Roselli and Marie. During the conference, Clifford and Marie, in the adjoining reception room, enter into a love scene. Bainbridge sees the action reflected in a mirror, loses his temper, and calls Roselli's attention to the scene. Roselli, angered at Clifford's presumption, discharges his secretary and forbids him all further intercourse with Marie.

Later, Clifford goes West. He succeeds in obtaining a position with the C. & D., which road is now steadily pressing forward its branch. All sorts of labor has been engaged, though the Indian element predominates. An accident causes the death of the superintendent of construction, and threatens to tie up the work on the branch. Clifford's knowledge of railroading comes to the fore, and he is sent to take the place of the dead superintendent. The troublesome Indians take to Clifford, and work is resumed.

Roselli and Bainbridge decide to go West, their object being the buying off of the C. & D.'s intention, or failing in this, to induce the rival road to come to some agreement which will be an advantage to the D. & H. Roselli's private car is placed in commission and, accompanied by Marie and Bainbridge, he starts West. En route to the scene of activity, the Roselli special runs over and kills a squaw and her papoose. The squaw is the wife of Crowfoot, Clifford's Indian foreman. The tragedy causes no little excitement among the Indians, but Clifford, unaware of the identity of the occupants of the "special," manages to smooth things over, and the excitement dies down.

Still later, when Roselli fails in his mission, Bainbridge, in an effort to impede the work on the C. & D., hires men to supply liquor to the Indian laborers. His scheme is successful, though it comes near to resulting in another tragedy. Inflamed with the liquor, and smarting over the death of his wife and child, Crowfoot organizes his Indians and starts forth to revenge himself upon the occupants of the private car. Clifford hears the trouble, succeeds in calming the enraged foreman, but fails to hold the drink-crazed Indians. The Indians blow up a stretch of the main line, then force Roselli's engineer to pull his train on to a spur. The fireman escapes and starts for assistance. He meets Clifford, tells of the danger to Roselli and Marie, and Clifford, with the assistance of a number of cowboys, hastens to the rescue of Roselli's party. A running battle ensues with the Indians on the train and the cowboys on the ground. The Indians are defeated and driven away. Recognitions are mutual. Roselli is quick to recognize the worth of his daughter's lover, admits his defeat, and, as a reward for having saved the lives of himself and Marie, gives his consent to the marriage of the two young people.

THE DISTRICT ATTORNEY'S BROTHER (Two Parts—Dec. 8).—Frank and Jack are twin brothers in college. Frank is a hard-working student while Jack is a college sport. Through trickery on Jack's part, he steals Frank's examination papers, and thus passes his final examinations with high honors. Frank leaves college in disgrace, having failed in his examinations through his brother's deceit. Jack thereupon wins the love of the girl in whom his brother was also interested. They marry and Frank starts to go down hill. In after years, Jack is elected district attorney through the assistance of his brother, Frank, who prepares all his speeches and engineers his campaign. As in days past, Jack shows his ungratefulness and neglects his brother. Discouraged, Frank joins a gang of thieves, and is caught when committing a robbery. His brother, Jack, sends him up despite the pleadings of his wife.

At the time of Frank's release from prison the district attorney is handling the most important case of his career. The night before the case comes to trial Jack calls on his brother for aid, and the latter takes up the work, while Jack, the district attorney, carouses in a room in the same building. Frank works all night and falls asleep, Jack becoming heavily intoxicated. When Frank awakens he finds his brother in no condition to attend court, so he pleads the case and wins it. Jack's wife recognizes the difference between Frank and her husband, but is not certain. She meets Frank outside of the court and takes him home with her. He falls asleep from exhaustion. Jack, meantime, awakes from his drunken stupor and gets into a drunken brawl, in which he is killed. His widow reads the news of her husband's death and at the close of the story realizes that she loves Frank as she had in the early days.

A NIGHT OF THRILLS (Two Parts—Dec. 13).—Hazel and Jack are about to be married. At his death, Hazel's uncle, Howard Wild, has bequeathed to them as a wedding present a deed to the old Wild mansion. He leaves to each a key, believing in equal rights for man and woman. The gift recalls to Hazel and Jack the many happy hours they spent with the old man and how often he had acted as peacemaker in their childish quarrels. The wedding day approaches. A gossipping friend imparts to Hazel a bit of scandal, concerning Jack's name with that of another. They quarrel and Hazel, to avoid questions, decides to hide in the old Wild mansion till the scandal of the broken engagement at the eleventh hour blows over. Without Hazel's suspecting, Jack has followed her to Uncle Howard's country estate.

Howard Wild, during his life, was not only famous as a collector of antiques, but also for his wine cellar. A couple of crooks seize their last chance to rob the place before the arrival of the bridal couple in a few days. Hazel arrives at the deserted house and makes herself comfortable, forlornly dwelling on her quarrel with Jack, when she is startled by the noise of the robbers. Overcome with fear, she watches them through the curtain helping themselves to her late uncle's treasures. They pause in their operations to see if any wine has been left in the cellar. Hazel takes this opportunity to escape, and as she runs out into the hall she encounters Jack, who has just entered with his latchkey. In the dark hall she mistakes him for another crook and, with a piercing scream, faints away. The burglars, hearing the scream, believe they are in a haunted house and beat a hasty retreat, leaving the booty behind. Jack revives Hazel, learns the reason of her fright and also that she does not intend to forgive him unless he humbles himself before her. Jack refuses to do this, knowing he is innocent. Uncle Howard's spirit comes to them and again acts as the peacemaker and the sweethearts start for home to be married on the morrow.

THE THREE MEN WHO KNEW (Two Parts—Dec. 10).—Watson falls asleep while reading the novel, "The Three Men Who Knew," an Oriental mystery. Asleep, he dreams and the dream seems horrible reality. He sees himself and two friends, Gibson and Ferguson, going through a series of strange adventures, commencing in an Oriental temple in India.

The native worshipers are kneeling before their idol in adoration. The three men burst in and defame the god. The natives grovel in fear of what might be the result, but the three men, laughing loudly, leave the temple. The High Priest curses them with all the fervor of his enraged being.

The three men return to America and forget the incident. But the curse of the High Priest follows them; and from some strange source each receives a miniature of the idol they have insulted. At Watson's home they all meet that evening, and as they stand to give each other a toast there appears in the center of the room the figure of the High Priest. They fear inwardly, but on the surface each displays a certain amount of bravado, fearing to be called a coward.

Ferguson and Gibson go home with a strange feeling of impending disaster. But they laugh away these thoughts and go to bed. Strange things happen. In their sleep they see themselves, bound and gagged, carried into the temple to be sacrificed before the idol. The idol kills them by a stroke of lightning. The men awake in the morning and find on their arms a red design which they cannot erase.

Watson awakens from a troubled sleep and finds on his dresser the miniature god surrounded by a strange light. He gets up and moves toward it, but it disappears. He turns on the light and finds no one. He puts out the light and the miniature returns. He becomes angry and throws the god out of the window. In the morning he finds the god has returned. So it goes until one of the men dies mysteriously. Watson, fearing for his own life, becomes a nervous wreck. He sees a figure and shoots at it, and then discovers it is his wife. Watson, terrified, turns the gun on himself and levels it at his head—there is a flash—and Watson awakens. It was the fuse blowing out that awakened him.

THE GENII OF THE VASE (Dec. 9).—Erny goes fishing, leaving his mother washing. He goes down to the pier and commences to fish; he falls asleep, is awakened by a bite on the line and pulls up an old vase. He is about to throw it back, when he sees it is corked. Thinking it might be wine, he opens it, and lo, out raises a great cloud of smoke from which a Genii springs. He salutes the frightened Erny as his slave and tells him to command him.

Erny wishes for a machine and money. He gets hands full and an automobile. He then wishes for a girl, and a beautiful nymph appears; he wishes for jewels, and gets strings of them; he wishes he were a king and he is in a wonderful car with ermine robes and people bowing and scraping to him; suddenly an anarchist drops a bomb under his carriage, it blows up and he goes miles in the air, and when he alights his mother is bouncing his head on the pier with her wash-stick and brings him home to the wash tub by his left ear.

THE FOREST THIEVES (Dec. 9).—Asa Hatch, multi-millionaire, receives a telegram from Anson Slade, supervisor of a natural forest in Wyoming, accepting a bribe Hatch has offered in order to secure Slade's services in stealing timber land from the government. The plan is to locate large holdings as homesteads, prior to the addition of adjoining public lands to the national forest. Hatch goes to Bisonville to meet Slade. By mistake he introduces himself to Troublesome McWhorter, a forest ranger in uniform, and shows McWhorter Slade's telegram. McWhorter's suspicions against the superior officer and Hatch are aroused.

Meantime, Slade attempts to make love to the Bisonville Postmistress, Anne Keith, and McWhorter knocks him down. Slade and Hatch start out to survey false agricultural claims, and are followed by McWhorter. They go to Slade's cabin, after completing surveys, and make out a list of "Dummy" entries, which must be filled at land office prior to the setting aside of the land as part of national forest. This list is put in envelope and sealed and left on table. McWhorter comes in, addresses similar envelope on typewriter, stamps it, and leaves it in place of original document. Slade mails McWhorter's substitute, thinking it is the original list. A week later he and Hatch, who have been carousing, hear that the list has not arrived. They accuse the postmistress of holding back the envelope. They catch her on the trail and take her to their cabin, where they attempt to force a confession from her. On the way she breaks off twigs and drops her handkerchief and glove. McWhorter had taught her that breaking twigs is signal for help.

He rides along the trail, finds twigs broken, picks up handkerchief and glove and follows to cabin, where he arrives in time to rescue Anne. He shows Slade a telegram from Washington, announcing that the public lands have been added to the reserve a week ahead of time on account of McWhorter's exposure of contemplated fraud. The telegram also says McWhorter will get supervisor's place. Ranger and Anne on their wedding trip is the final scene.

ON THE LEDGE (Two Parts—Dec. 12).—A poor widow dies, leaving her two young children, Bob and Mabel, in the care of a poor neighbor, who later is forced by circumstances to give them to an asylum. Twenty years pass and Jack, who has been adopted by a good family, has now gone into business for himself and is a rising young broker. He has been searching the detective agencies for his sister, without success, for some years.

Mabel ran away from the asylum—has been brought up by a poor family, is without education and is now employed as a servant, and on a certain day is hanging clothes on a roof nearby a large office building, in which Bob has his office, and a small boy is flying his kite from the same rooftop. Bob is on a balcony, or ledge, outside his office window and the janitor, thinking him gone for the day, closes and locks the iron fire shutters, locking him out on the balcony. A big deal is on, and after a long wait, during which he vainly tries to attract someone's attention, he feels against his cheek the tail of the kite the small boy is now pulling in. He hastily ties a note telling of his predicament, to the kite tail, and sends it off. The boy finds it, takes it to Mabel, who leads a run to the rescue party and bob's assistance, and the two are reunited.

THE KAFFIR'S SKULL (Two Parts—Nov. 28).—Elsie Brandon receives a letter from her uncle in South Africa, telling her that he has found a huge diamond in the rough which he is shipping to America in a kaffir's skull, addressing the package to an assumed name at the express office. His reason for doing this is that a man named Healy is trying to steal the diamond. He adds that he will follow on a later steamer and claim the package. Six months afterward Elsie and Jack Dwyer, a young lawstudent, who loves her but is too poor to marry, go to meet the steamer on which the girl's uncle is expected. He fails to appear, and they learn of the disappearance of a man overboard, whose description corresponds with that of Mr. Brandon: Not knowing the assumed name, they cannot claim the package containing the diamond. They attend a sale of unclaimed express luggage, in the vain hope of identifying the package. The eagerness of a rough looking man in the crowd to buy a certain box gives them a clue, and they manage to bid him down and get away with the box. It proves to contain the skull and the diamond. Elsie persuades Dwyer to take the gem for safe keeping. He is shadowed to his lodgings, however, by the defeated bidder who is none other than Healy. Elsie, fearing this very thing, follows, after summoning the police. Healy's arrest results in his conviction of the murder of Brandon on shipboard. Elsie and Dwyer sell the diamond, and start married life with a fortune.

OUR MUTUAL GIRL, NO. 46 (Nov. 30).—Into the maelstrom of Fifth avenue activity Margaret and Aunt Abbie plunged one sunshiny November morning. In Margaret's heart was the desire to buy, not for herself but for her relatives and her friends. Also, in her mind ran the injunction about doing one's Christmas shopping early. At Joseph's she purchased some jeweled buckles, and then a handsome vanity box. Top and sides, it was a magnificent product of the goldworker's art, and Our Mutual Girl took especial satisfaction in the fact that it never had been duplicated or copied.

When they started across the sidewalk to their limousine, they ran into Betty Hamilton. "Margaret! You dear! You're the very person I've been looking for!" cried Betty. "I want you to promise that you will go with me to-night to a Thanksgiving house party at one of my friend's. Ralph is to be there—"

Just here Margaret interrupted her with some perfectly irrevelant remark—but in the end she accepted the invitation, of course.

Aunt Abbie had left them and gone about some mysterious holiday purchases of her own. Betty had an appointment. And so Our Mutual Girl started back to Westchester alone. It was nearly dark when suddenly the car came to a stop in a lonely stretch of country road. Murray, the chauffeur, got out to work over the recalcitrant carburetor—and Margaret left the car and stood near him. Somehow she had an uneasy feeling—and just then two men came out of the bushes.

They engaged the chauffeur in aimless talk. While one of them held his attention, the other darted toward Margaret and snatched her gold handbag. Then they both ran. Murray started in pursuit, but Margaret called him back. She did not so much mourn the loss of her mesh purse as she regretted the stealing of the gold vanity case which was inside—but she had no mind to be left alone in the dark and deserted road.

Our Mutual Girl was a bit late in reaching the house of the Thanksgiving festivities that evening. She explained her tardiness by recounting her unpleasant adventure. Not long after, the butler announced the arrival of their hostess's uncle. It seemed that he had been warned by letter that he was to be robbed of an heirloom and had hastened with the jewel to his niece's house, thinking thus to defeat the plans of the robbers. Highwaymen, however, are not to be so easily forestalled. The dinner had passed off merrily and everybody was having the best sort of a time when the uncle discovered that his gem was gone. Our Mutual Girl had not had repeated experiences with burglars and kidnappers and stolen jewels for nothing. She went to the garage, ordered a car, picked up two policemen on post nearby, and tracing footprints on the lawn, led the officers to the spot where the two thieves were engaged in deep-toned altercation. As she suspected they turned out to be the same crooks who had snatched her handbag a few hours before. With the help of the policemen, Our Mutual Girl conducted her captives back to her hostess's drawing room in triumph. Both the jewel and the vanity box were recovered.

IN WILDMAN'S LAND (Dec. 11).—The Baldwins had visited many strange parts of the earth, but never one that was quite so strange as that in which they now found themselves. The innkeeper told them when they set out that morning to visit the rocky fastnesses of Wildman's Land that there was no danger. It is true there were traditions that a queer race of primitive people had at one time inhabited the dark caves of this wonderful region, but no living white man had ever seen them and they were believed to be myths. It was a weird and beautiful prospect that greeted the Baldwins as they reached the point of ascent into the unexplored country. On a grassy knoll they prepared and ate their lunch and then, before commencing the hazardous climb, they rested for a while under the shade of a giant rock. Little Harry, their only child, was romping about and they warned him not to venture too far lest the wild men should catch him.

It seemed to Mrs. Baldwin but a moment before that she cautioned the boy and yet now he had disappeared. The anxious mother went in search of him. Far up in the rocks she continued her way, when to her unspeakable terror she perceived that the stories of wild men had been no invention of fancy. Harry was in the clutches of a creature, half beast and half human. Inspired with the courage of desperation, Mrs. Baldwin rushed to the rescue of her offspring, but she was no match for the fierce savage. Beaten back, she fled to her husband for aid. But now the powerful males of the tribe appeared. They attacked the frantic parents from all sides. Mr. Baldwin succeeded in killing three of them, but in the end was overcome and fell a victim to their primitive fury. All this time the wild female clung to little Harry. At last the frenzied mother thought of her child's doll-baby. It was apparent that the female beast was holding Harry as she might have held her own offspring. Perhaps she had lost her own little baby. The doll baby might deceive her. Feverishly Mrs. Baldwin ran back to the camping place, found the doll and returned to the creature who held Harry captive. Casting the doll to the wild woman, Mrs. Baldwin scarcely breathed as she watched the result. The plan worked. The savage mother dropped little Harry and sprang toward the brilliantly-clothed wax figure. Seizing it in both hands she held it close to her breast. Little Harry, thus freed, ran to his mother, but alas, it was too late. One of the giant men rushed to Mrs. Baldwin and was about to dash out her brains when she awoke, only to find little Harry pounding away on her head to arouse her from her slumbers. It had been a dream, but all so vivid that she insisted on their immediate departure from this weird region of the world.

A QUESTION OF COURAGE (Two Parts—Dec. 6).—A soldier's widow and her three sons comprise a happy family. While at dinner news comes of the fall of Sumter and Lincoln's call for men. Mother bravely decides to give her three sons to her country. At Bull Run, Harry, the oldest son, is fatally wounded and dies after an effective scene in which he yields his colors to his comrade. Mother covers the chair he occupied at the table with the flag that draped the portrait of her dead husband.

Edward, the second son, is killed as he delivers General Grant's dispatches. Mother covers the second son's chair at the table with a flag. Robert, the youngest son, is in camp near his home. Mother learns that a battle is eminent. She resolves that the remaining boy must not be killed. She goes to the camp, finds Robert in his tent preparing for an expected battle. When the bugle sounds "Boots and Saddles" she frantically tries to detain him with her entreaties. Finally she seizes his pistol, puts it to her breast and threatens to end her life with it if Robert leaves the tent. The troopers are leaving for the fray. Robert is obliged to choose between his country and his mother. He remains, brokenhearted, saying she has branded him as a coward.

After the battle, Robert, charged with cowardice and desertion, is arrested. On the day of the court-martial, General Grant, on a tour of inspection, stops at the Winthrop house to rest, sees the two flags on the chairs and learns the story of the three sons from Auntie. At the court-martial Robert is asked to speak in his behalf, but says nothing. Mother forces her way by a sentry and tells the story. Robert tries to hush her, fails and turns his back. General Grant arrives in time to hear her story, exonerates Robert, declares his act required more courage than to face enemies, orders him to report for duty, and reconciles mother and son. When peace has been declared Robert returns home with the remnant of troop that started and his mother thankfully folds him to her breast.

HER BRAVE HERO (Dec. 8).—Mr. Gay, receiving a ticket and invitation to a bal masque, hires a costume, but knowing his wife will object, he secretly smuggles it into the house, intending to go to the ball when wife is asleep. But Mrs. Gay has fears about a burglar operating in the neighborhood. Gay calms her fears and so that she will go to bed early Gay suggests that she take a sleeping powder, but Mrs. Gay discovers the costumes, then understanding why Gay was so anxious for her to sleep, decides to turn the tables. Instead of taking the sleeping powder herself she puts it in Gay's decanter of whiskey. Then hiding the costume where Gay can't find it, she peacefully sleeps.

Mary, the maid, entertains Hogan, the cop. Hogan is thirsty, so Mary helps him freely from her master's decanter. Gay is pleased when he finds his wife asleep. Not able to find the costume he is about to start to the ball without it. The drugged whiskey had its effect on Hogan. Mary, after vainly trying to awaken him, has left him asleep in the kitchen. Gay hears Hogan snoring in the kitchen, investigates and gets an idea as he sees Hogan's uniform. He leaves the house, dressed in Hogan's uniform, and then wishes he had a mask. Belt, the burglar, has just finished work in a neighboring house. He is about to leave when he sees Gay, and mistaking him for a cop, he drops bag of tools and runs.

While looking through the bag, Gay discovers Belt's mask. His costume complete, he hastens to the ball. Later, Belt arrives at Gay's house. Sees an open window and enters. But before he starts to work he takes several drinks of drugged whiskey and is soon fast asleep. Mrs. Gay awakens and angry at her husband's action, starts to investigate. She hears Hogan, who has awakened, and thinking that it is maybe her husband, she enters the kitchen. Seeing a strange man, she runs out screaming, and turning the key in the door, she locks Hogan in. Then tries to take refuge in the dining-room, but finds another strange man in there. She screams again as she comes from room. Hogan hearing her scream manages to get out of the kitchen by the back door, and running around side of house, tries to enter through open window. But Mrs. Gay, as she sees his head coming through open window, mistakes Hogan for another burglar, and gathering courage, knocks him out with a club, then retires to her own room and locks the door. When Gay arrives home he finds Hogan unconscious. He helps him into the house, gives him back his uniform, and while Hogan is dressing, Gay discovers the burglar. Belt is still asleep. So Gay has an easy time to capture him single-handed. Mrs. Gay hearing her husband's voice, comes on the scene as Gay has his foot on the burglar's neck. Mrs. Gay embraces her husband and calls him "Her Brave Hero."

KOMIC.

THE HOUSEBREAKERS (Dec. 13).—Bunko Bill, a famous crook, gets a job at a country house as a gardener in order to rob the place. It is the home of the Commissioner of Police, and his niece is in love with a young man who is staying there. But she refuses to marry him unless he commits some deed of daring, such as catching a burglar red-handed, or something of that sort. So Harris, the aforesaid young man, cooks up a scheme with what he thinks is the gardener—alas Bunko Bill. It is that the gardener shall burglarize the house and allow Harris to catch him and turn him over, apparently to the police. He will then contrive to let him escape, etc.

Bunko Bill steals the silverware one night before hand, and Harris catches him. Though Bill is not very well pleased and while they are talking Mrs. Commissioner, a stern and husky female, holds them both up at the point of a gun and demands to know what is what. Harris is afraid to let her know of their scheme and Mrs. Commissioner has Bunko Bill arrested, and Harris also. Bunko Bill is recognized and arrested by the Commissioner and fearful of the Commissioner knowing that she was so careless as to be duped into hiring him Bunko Bill, she allows Harris to pose as a real hero and he gets the girl.

AMERICAN.

THE ARCHAEOLOGIST (Nov. 25).—James Devon, a playwright, takes a villa on the Mediterranean, where he can work in quiet and without interruption. His daughter, May, is terribly bored. She goes to the hotel where her friend, Edna Lee, another American girl, is staying, and they discover Billy Green, a student of archaeology. Green, however, is so engrossed in his subjects that he is blind to the girls' attractions. This piques May, and she makes a vow that she will win his love. Armed with a statuette, she wanders with Edna to a seat in the hotel grounds near where Green is sitting. Then she tells her friend enthusiastically about this treasure which she has unearthed in her garden. Green becomes interested at once and asks to call the next day to investigate. The girls go to a curio shop and stock up with "antiquities." With the help of Snow Ball, the negro gardener, the girls bury these near the villa, and the next day Green digs them up. He is so excited over the possibility that they are living over a buried city that he cannot be prevailed upon to stay for luncheon—to the great disappointment of the girls. So they plant more bait. That night Mr. Devon takes a fancy to do some excavating on his own account. At breakfast he displays his finds, and the girls discover themselves undone. Then they invent a new scheme for entrapping the archaeological Billy. Edna sends him word that they have discovered a beautiful statue, and offers to lead him to it. He is overcome with admiration for the classic maiden, and when it comes to life, like Pygmalion's Galatea, he falls in love with the fair reality —who is May. Mr. Devon, when he hears how his very acceptable son-in-law has been won, pays the sizeable bill, which the dealer in antiquities sends in, without a murmur.

THE BEGGAR CHILD (Nov. 30).—Hugo, a poor artist, adopts his motherless child model who has been deserted by her father. He paints a picture of little Lycia, which he calls "The Beggar Child." The canvas brings him fame and wealth. Eighteen years later, Lycia, as the daughter of the famous artist, is courted by Count Roberto, whose attentions she accepts until the appearance of Dan Street, a young art student, who saves her from drowning. Rosa, a peasant girl, whom the Count has betrayed, tells Lycia her story, and the Count is dismissed. Determined to win Lycia at any cost, he plots with the butler in Hugo's employ to kidnap the girl. Meanwhile, Rosa's brother, seeking to avenge his sister, has entered the Count's service. He discovers the conspiracy and substitutes Rosa for Lycia on the occasion of the secret marriage which the Count thinks he is forcing upon the artist's adopted daughter. Later, Marco, the butler, discovers that Lycia is his own child. He proves this to Hugo. But Lycia, still believing herself Hugo's child, finds happiness with Dan, to whom alone the artist relates the true story of her birth and bringing up.

BEAUTY.

AS A MAN THINKETH (Nov. 24).—William Jones is capable enough, but he allows himself to be imposed upon by everybody he knows. Visiting a fortune-teller, he is told that he has "an iron will" and is "destined to govern." Mr. Jones goes home and subdues his domineering wife. At the office he shows his fellow clerks their proper places, strikes the boss for a raise, and is promised the advance if he succeeds in getting a business contract, which has been returned, signed by the refusing party. He takes the papers and within the hour is back with the signature. The raise materializes; he is made head clerk; and after that he goes home every night to a wife who thoroughly respects him.

KEYSTONE.

AN INCOMPETENT HERO (Nov. 12).—Fatty admires the young pianist and singer in the apartment across the way, and the notes he casts through her window enrage her husband, who does not appreciate his wife's talent. He threatens Fatty. That same night a burglar gets into the pianist's apartment while her husband is out. Summoned to the rescue, Fatty crosses one window to another on a clothesline, with the worthy intention of chastising the thief. He has the misfortune, however, to land in the lady's room, where he is found by her returning husband. Quite a commotion follows until the husband's bullets give out. The burglar, meanwhile, has escaped to the cellar, whence he makes his getaway.

HOW HEROES ARE MADE (Nov. 14).—It has been arranged between the fathers that their children shall marry. When the young people meet, the intended husband, who is somewhat rakish in appearance, falls desperately in love with the girl—but she spurns him. He bribes two young men to kidnap the girl, in order that he may play the hero and rescue her. However, he does not know that one of the "kidnappers" is the young man whom Mabel really is in love with, and his confidential friend, who, of course, delight in the deception. The intended fails to find his courage under the influence of a gun held within an inch of his face. In the end, her desired lover marries the girl, and the coward is kicked out by the girl's father.

FATTY'S JONAH DAY (Nov. 16).—Fatty is sitting on a park bench lost to the world in a perusal of "Three Weeks." Mabel waits till father falls asleep, then she goes to see what Fatty is so absorbed in. They share the book between them. A suitor, upon whom Mabel does not smile, wakes father, points out to him the two figures on the bench, and enlightens him as to what they are reading. They attack Fatty as a corrupter of innocence. He gives them back their medicine with a vengeance. Then he and Mabel dive off a high bridge into the river, climb out, and seating themselves comfortably on the opposite bank, go on with their story.

FATTY'S WINE PARTY (Nov. 21).—Fatty, in need of money, borrows a dollar from a friend who is waiting to take Mabel, a girl friend of his, out for a party. As Fatty walks away with his dollar he sees Mabel in the distance. Mabel also sees him, and rushes to his side and kisses him for he is very popular with the ladies. All this is seen by the man who has lent Fatty the dollar and two friends of his. They also see Fatty and Mabel disappear into a restaurant, though Fatty, due to his shortness of funds, was reluctant to go. Once inside, however, the amusing antics of the waiter, as played by Charles Chaplin, dispel his gloom until he sees his three friends arriving. They order wine, and then disappear, leaving a bill of $27.50 for Fatty to pay. Unable to

PRINCESS.

A BUM MISTAKE (Nov. 20).—Mills, a vaudeville tramp, and his companion, September Morn, receive a telegram from the Royal Order of Crows to perform at their banquet. They are unconsciously forestalled, however, by a regular hobo, who arrives at the depot, and after stealing Doom the drummer's satchel, is seized and borne off by the delegates of the Royal Order to the banquet hall. A little later the actor tramp and his actress partner reach the depot, where they are grabbed by the constable summoned by Doom. On investigating the satchel Mills carries, however, they fail to find anything therein save September Morn's little union suit. The vaudeville tramp and his companion arrive at the hall just in time to see the hobo being presented with the loving cup. They expose the imposter, who is driven from the hall. Then the Royal Order showers its money and flowers upon the delighted comedian.

THE WILD, WOOLLY WEST (Nov. 27).—Cy Perkins does not love his job on the farm. He puts in every minute he can steal from work reading five-cent novels of the Wild and Woolly West. At last penniless, he does not know what to do—when he runs into a man who is looking for help on his farm. Cy is so overjoyed to find himself back on the familiar job, that he kisses the first cow he meets on his employer's place.

A prize fighter, who applies, is selected, and the operation transforms the peevish old man into a bunch of fire crackers. He enters upon an outrageous flirtation with a young lady barely one-third his age. While wining and dining her in a cafe, he loses his pocket book. The manager compels Mr. Grumps to work out his bill as a waiter, and thus, forcibly detained, he has to serve his own wife and daughter. They then learn the whole story, pay the amount due—and Mr. Grumps is marched home to the farm.

To "get even" with John Warner, Horgan, though giving false evidence, has Donald convicted of the crime. Donald is sentenced to death by the electric chair. On the night of the execution, Horgan goes to John Warner's office at 11.45 and tells John that Donald is innocent of the crime. He does this to torture John, as he has had the telephone wires to the prison cut and thinks it impossible for John to save Donald. After a desperate struggle with Horgan, John rushes to the power house and has the current turned off, plunging the entire city into darkness and making it impossible for the execution to take place. Donald has already been strapped into the chair, but when the prison warden realizes the power is off he orders Donald returned to his cell. John rushes from the power house to the prison, where he explains to the warden and Donald is taken home to his heart-broken mother and fiance. Horgan, who has gone insane, is taken to the hospital.

Mr. King arrives in America, and upon the day of his arrival the most daring crime ever heard of is committed. Miss Dorothy Stevens is kidnapped in broad daylight in her automobile. The chauffeur was found drugged in an alley. Mr. King decides not to report this crime to the police, as to be seen with them might hinder him in his work, so he starts on the case alone. He spots his man, "Smiley Randel," holds him up, and thereby gaining his confidence, joins the gang as a first-class hold-up man. When he has located Miss Stevens, and about to get her away, Madge Burke does a clever piece of work and upsets his plans. He is bound and thrown into a room, but upon rolling toward the door overhears the plans of the gang, namely, to leave the port on the schooner Blanche that night. He finds a mirror, and by throwing a mirror into a policeman's eyes, attracts his attention and gets him to come to the window. Bob, while accusing her of loving Carl, demands that she shall carry out her agreement to marry him; as an alternative threatens to take Carl's money and destroy his new home. POLIDOR, THE SLEEP-WALKER.—Polidor's wife is extremely jealous of him and will not allow him to join any late parties at cafes. His friends suggest to him as a means of getting out of the house he adopt the tactics of a sleep-walker. He accordingly arises in the middle of the night and is just leaving the house when he is discovered by his angry wife. When she sees that he is walking in his sleep, frightened for his safety, she rushes out in the street, and calls the police. They start on a hunt for Polidor, but he is safely enjoying a delightful entertainment with his friends. She breaks in in the midst of the wine supper and Polidor instantly freezes into his somnambulistic attitude. He starts off with the prettiest girl in the room, followed closely by the police and his wife, and by chance drops the letter on the street. When his wife reads this, the police come up and arrest poor Polidor.

POLIDOR, THE HUNCHBACK.—This is the story of a poor hunchback who is in love with a beautiful girl, but is thrown over by her because of his deformity. He tries in every possible way in his despair to rid himself of this disfigurement, by throwing himself on the floor, rubbing against iron railings, and all sorts of ridiculous ways, but finally goes to a witch and purchases from her, with an immense fortune, the secret of taking away his own hump and giving a hump to others. Hastening to his bride's house he finds her in the midst of the wedding ceremony and just in time puts a hump on her and all the assembled guests. They plead with him on bended knees, hailing him as a master of all the black arts to rid them of this sudden visitation and he does so at the price of obtaining the bride from the unwilling father.

MAX AND THE FAIR M. D. (Pathe).—Max discovers that in the same apartment house with him lives a most charming woman doctor. To meet her he fakes a sickness and calls upon her for professional advice. She thumps him, puts her little ear down to his chest, diagnoses his case and prescribes for him. Max departs so full of happiness that he finds difficulty in walking as a sober man should.

The days pass and, winning the lady's love, Max becomes married to her. On the wedding night just as they have reached the seclusion of their own room and Max has started to pour out his rapture into her willing ear, the servant hammers at their door. They find that the bride is called out upon a case, so in wedding gown and orange blossoms she leaves the despondent Max to await her return. The time passes and finally she returns, but only for a moment. The servant raps at the door again, and again she must go out to see a patient. The unhappy bridegroom protests in vain. He is sleeping uneasily in his chair when she finally comes back. As they are embracing, the servant raps at the door again, announcing another call for the doctor. The now infuriated Max rushes upon the disturber of his happiness, throws him out of the room and locks the door.

A year later the happy husband, bearing a baby in his arms, wanders into the reception room of his wife's office. He finds it filled with waiting patients, all men. He steps into the office and sees the wife of his bosom, with her head at a man's chest listening to his heart. Filled with rage he deposits the baby in the arms of the man nearest him and proceeds to drive every patient out of the house. Thus he is convinced that from henceforth his wife must cease to be an "M. D." and become more of a wife and mother.

WHEN FATE WAS KIND (Three Parts).—Having long hidden his real motives toward Edwin Forbes behind the mask of friendship, Joel Lang at last gets his opportunity for revenge. Stella Le Roy has just returned from Europe and Lang determines to make use of the old affection which had existed between the girl and Edwin to excite Mrs. Forbes' jealousy and thus cause a separation. To aid him in this design, he has knowledge of a certain episode in Stella's past which was decidedly discreditable to her and which she is naturally most anxious not to have known. As a poor young girl, she was exposed to great temptation by having the opportunity to steal a valuable jewel. In a moment of weakness she fell, was afterwards detected and served a prison sentence. Though she has tried to live down the past and live a decent life, Lang threatens to expose her unless she aids him in his plots against Edwin. Edwin's brother, Billy, has been leading a rather fast life and has continually been receiving financial assistance from him. He makes another appeal for money to settle his gambling debts and is refused.

Lang goes to Mrs. Forbes, tells her that her husband is untrue and offers to prove his accusations. She asserts that she will divorce Forbes if he proves faithless. Meeting Stella at a restaurant, Lang invites her to accompany him to a dance, knowing that Forbes and his wife will attend. At the dance, Lang contrives to leave Forbes alone with Stella by dancing with Mrs. Forbes. Thus Mrs. Forbes' jealousy is aroused. The next day Lang compels Stella to call Forbes on the telephone and request him to loan her a thousand dollars, asking him to send it by mail. Actuated by his old love, and believing her to be in distress, Forbes makes out a check, which he places in an envelope to be mailed to Stella. Billy, however, has seen the check and decides to purloin it for himself. In Forbes' absence, Billy extracts the check and substitutes a business prospectus instead. Lang learns that Forbes has mailed the check to Stella and bribes her maid to secure the envelope when it is delivered by the postman. With the envelope in his possession, he takes it to Mrs. Forbes and advises her of its contents. She is wrought up over this seeming proof of her husband's duplicity and determines to confront him with the evidence. Going to his office, she produces the envelope and asks him to explain its import. Realizing now his indiscretion, Forbes tears open the envelope and is surprised to find therein only his prospectus. Ashamed of her unjust suspicions, Mrs. Forbes begs forgiveness and returns to her home, where she is awaited by Lang. She replies by severely lashing him with a cow-hide whip and drives the schemer from her house. Meanwhile, Billy becomes conscience-stricken, confesses to his brother that he had intended to steal the check and returns it to him. Overjoyed at Billy's reform and grateful that he has been the means of saving him from disgrace, Forbes rewards him by taking him into partnership. Billy then tells his brother of his love for Stella and announces that she has consented to marry him.

MORE THAN QUEEN (Pathe—Four Parts).—The Grand Duke Marony and his ambitious wife head a powerful party at the court of Narovia with the purpose of securing the throne. With this in view they decide to send Lieutenant Bernard, whose loyalty and absolute devotion to the queen make him a serious obstacle in their path, to Paris as the Norovian military attache. This plan is foiled by the queen, who orders instead that the officers of the Guard choose one of their own number to fill the post. Despite her command, Bernard is ordered by the conspirators to go to Paris. The insistence used in disposing of him leads the Lieutenant to fear for the queen's safety and he so advises her.

Undismayed by her first failure the scheming duchess zealously continues her plot against the queen. A Persian fete is planned at the summer palace. The duchess writes to the Queen's Costumer and requests him to make for her a costume the duplicate of the one ordered by the queen. A letter is then written to Bernard in the queen's name, asking him to meet her at the pool in the courtyard the night of the fete, as she has matters which she desires to discuss with him.

In response to this supposed request the lieutenant on the appointed evening keeps the tryst. Seeing the woman he supposes to be the queen he throws himself at her feet. At this juncture the duchess' fellow-accomplice, Sophia, one of the court ladies, carries out the plot by bringing the queen to see the apparent faithlessness of the lieutenant. Wounded to the heart by what she sees, the queen upbraids Bernard and then departs, leaving him little opportunity for explanation.

Through the carelessness of the servants, the palace catches fire and soon is roaring with flames from basement to roof. In the confusion and panic the lieutenant seeks the queen and, finding the duchess, again mistakes her identity. He carries her to safety only to find he has saved the wrong woman. Again plunging through the flames, he finds the queen and her little son and rescues them both at the risk of his life. The grateful queen cannot conceal from her gallant rescuer the love she feels for him. As their lips meet, conscious that for the sake of her son she should drive her love from her heart, she resolves to bury the woman in the queen and not yield to her love. So the lieutenant resolves to abide her resolution by going into voluntary exile, leaving the queen to rule for the sake of her son, lonely in the atmosphere of intrigue and jealousy.

So she would have continued to the end of her life, a martyr to her motherly devotion, were it not for a fatal accident which renders her childless. Determined now to follow the dictates of her heart, she abdicates the throne in favor of the Grand Duke and writes to the lieutenant that she will meet him in the city of his exile. There she tells him that her life and love are his if he will accept them, and together never to part they resolve to begin a new and happier life.

THE PERILS OF PAULINE (Episode No. 19—Two Parts).—The villainous Owen, ever striving to secure possession of the fortune of his ward, Pauline, is not discouraged by the numerous times his plans have been foiled by the courage and enterprise of his intended victim; and her fiance, Harry, disgusted with the lack of success which has attended the efforts of his accomplice, the gypsy Balthazar, lets him go and enlists the aid of a villainous cut-throat who masquerades under the name of "doctor" Louis Wrentz.

Unconsciously aiding Owen in his new plan, Harry is called out of town upon business, thus leaving Pauline without the aid of his advice. Owen has printed up some letterheads, giving the name of a fake publishing house in Philadelphia. He then typewrites upon one of these a letter to her, stating over the signature of the fake concern that they have seen in the Cosmopolitan magazine her marine story and believe her to be just the person to write a new serial story they have in mind. The letter requests her to call upon them at her earliest opportunity. Pauline is completely taken in by the letter, and at once leaves for Philadelphia. On the same train go Wrentz and his accomplices, men of his own stripe.

Arriving in Philadelphia that night Pauline goes to a hotel and is assigned to Room 22. Wrentz arrives shortly afterwards and requests the room next to her—24. He has sent to his room a large wardrobe trunk which he has designedly brought with him. The next day Pauline leaves the hotel to look up the publishers and Wrentz and his men take advantage of her absence to change the numbers on the doors of the two rooms. Failing to find the publishers, Pauline returns to her room thoroughly puzzled and determined to return to her home. Deceived by the numbers on the doors, she enters Wrentz's room and is at once seized, gagged and bound, and then placed in the trunk and locked in. A few moments later Wrentz pays for his room and has his trunk sent out the back way to where an auto is waiting. Placing the trunk in the car, the whole gang is whirled out of the city into the country.

It so happens that at this time a cage containing a huge gorilla is being unloaded from a circus car on a railroad siding a few miles out, and in the unloading falls and is broken open. The gorilla escapes from his prison, and when the men try and recapture him kills one of them and rushes to freedom.

Wrentz, when in the country, frees Pauline from the trunk and drives his car at such a furious pace that he soon finds himself pursued by two motorcycle policemen. Finding them gaining on him, he turns the car loose at the highest speed of which it is capable. Going around a curve on two wheels the car skids and is overturned. Out of the dust and confusion only two persons live to rise and extricate themselves from the wreckage—Pauline and Wrentz. Seeing that Wrentz still feebly pursues her, Pauline runs from him, and seeing an empty freight car standing on a railroad siding nearby enters it to hide. To her horror she finds that she has escaped from one danger only to run into a worse. The huge form of the escaped gorilla looms up in the semi-darkness of the car. The great beast seizes her in his powerful arms and drags her away.

In the meantime the motorcycle policemen have reached the wreck and, having seen two persons leave it, separate and set off in pursuit of them. The gorilla and his fainting burden are spied by one of them and bravely the policeman rushes to the girl's assistance. The gorilla is cornered at the edge of a rocky precipice and a furious fight ensues, which ends in the gorilla being severely wounded by numerous revolver shots fired by the policeman and plunging to his death far below. Pauline bends over her heroic rescuer, and finds to her delight that though badly injured he will live. Thus again she triumphs over her enemies.

JOLTS OF JEALOUSY (Pathe).—Life is made miserable for Mrs. Kanhee owing to the absurdly foolish jealousy of her husband. She is continually kept in hot water owing to the misinterpretation by him of multitudes of petty little things in her daily life till patience has almost ceased to be a virtue.

It happens one day that Jennie spies in a newspaper the advertisement of a well-to-do Swedish farmer, Hense Tensen, who states that he desires to wed a handsome young woman and requests a photograph with the application. Jennie writes him and tells Hense that she answers the qualifications. Her nervous excitement causes her to pick up the wrong photograph from the table and enclose it. Unfortunately for the peace of every one concerned, it is the photo of Mrs. Kanhee.

Hense is inordinately pleased with the photo and at once determines to call in person upon his affinity. It so happens that when he calls at the Kanhee residence Jennie has been sent upon an errand and naturally Hense mistakes the mistress for the maid. His wooing is more ardent than tactful and Mrs. Kanhee's trouble increases with the untimely arrival of her husband. Poor Hense is chased from room to room while the incensed husband empties the contents of a revolver in his wake. It remains for the innocent cause of the trouble, Jennie, to restore peace by explaining her error in mailing the photograph.

THIRY YEARS OF A GAMBLER'S LIFE (Pathe—Three Parts).—George Notman is engaged to Marjorie Vincent, and the young people, though the marriage was arranged by their parents, are thoroughly devoted to one another. George has a friend, Warner, who beneath a polished exterior hides a deceitful and treacherous character. This is plainly shown when he attempts to make love to Marjorie, the fiancee of his friend. His advances are indignantly repulsed and the girl then learns to thoroughly distrust the man and to endeavor to oppose his influence with George.

George's father makes his son a present of a large sum of money with which to purchase a splendid pearl necklace for Marjorie. Warner basely suggests that with this money it would be possible to make large sums at the gaming table and persuades him to venture it. The inevitable happens; the money is lost and George is confronted with the necessity of securing funds in some way to purchase his sweetheart her necklace. Warner suggests visiting a certain woman, known to the police as a "fence," who makes a practice of loaning money at usurious rates of interest. At her store they are shown a fine necklace which she is willing to sell and accept George's notes in payment. The necklace is bought and the notes given.

Not long afterward at the wedding reception detectives call and ask for George's father. To him they exhibit his son's notes, which they have found in a raid upon the "fence." They ask to see Marjorie's necklace. At once they are able to identify it as one stolen from a jeweler not long before. The heartbroken father writes a check for the value of the necklace to save it from confiscation. Angered beyond all control at this proof of his son's folly, he upbraids him before the whole assembly, then falls in an apoplectic fit which not long after is the cause of his death.

After his marriage George falls more and more under the sinister influence of Warner. The combined fortunes of his wife and himself are insufficient to sustain the drains made upon them by his gambling losses. Warner suggests an evil plan and again George assents to it. Finding a man who is a typical "sucker," they work an old confidence game upon him and persuade him that they can give him the names of the winning horses before a race. He loses, of course, and later by plying him with drink they are able to steal the rest of his money. The victim learns the name and addeess of George and calls upon his wife. He tells her of her husband's crime and threatens him with immediate arrest if the money is not returned at once. When George comes home and learns that his guilt has been found out, he attempts suicide. Moved by the misery of the unhappy wife the victim of the theft relents and for her sake promises to push the case no further.

The years pass. Compelled by her poverty Marjorie has placed her little son in her uncle's care, since she is not able to give the boy a proper bringing up. George and David have taken a little country inn, where they prey upon the rural gamblers. Old beyond her time, Marjorie, still faithful to her marriage vows, does the work of a menial around the house. Her uncle, feeling that she should see her son again, gives him a large sum of money and sends him to her. How Warner and George, ignorant of the young man's identity, plan to rob him; how they are thwarted and David suffers the penalty for his many misdeeds, and how the father, sobered by his narrow escape from killing his own son, resolves to live a better life, end a most dramatic film.

ZUDORA (Episode No. 3—The Mystery of the Dutch Cheese Maker—Two Parts).—In the same building live an old inventor who has discovered the secret of diamond manufacture and a maker of Dutch cheese. Characteristically funny is the cheese maker smiling the day through, as his customers come in and purchase his stock. Ever ready with a joke is this cheese maker and life to him is not at all serious. Not so the inventor of diamonds. Cooped up in his basement rooms this man has lived his life almost out striving to gain something, some plan, that would rival nature's own making. And he has succeeded. To him has come the knowledge of making diamonds, so that their lustre makes pale the stones dug from the earth itself. The cheese maker is a friend of John Storm's. The diamond inventor is an acquaintance of Hassam Ali. One day the merchant sends for Storm to come over to the shop and draw up a will. Storm goes and willingly prepares the legal document. As he finishes his slight task, the cheese maker offers him, as a gift, some freshly made cheese. Storm jokes with the girls in the shop, chuckles a youngster under the chin and departs with his bundle. As he passes out the door, he almost brushes against Hassam Ali.

Then to Hassam Ali, comes the diamond inventor with the news that his wooden chests wherein he keeps his stock of diamonds have been systematically robbed. The mystic detective is eager. Not so much that the chests have been robbed, but that the opportunity is presented whereby he can learn the inventor's secret and perhaps turn to his own account its value. He goes down to the inventor's room. He is shown the process, the blazing furnace and method of treatment until the finished, sparkling diamond rolls hot into his hand.

Later the inventor and Hassam Ali meet Storm, the latter again carrying a parcel of cheese from the shop, which accidentally is dropped and picked up by Hassam Ali. Carried home the mystic detective examines the cheese and lo and behold, it was radiant with diamonds of all sizes. Hassam Ali smiled a cynical smie. Here, then, is another chance to get John Storm into the toils, and perhaps this time to get rid of him and make it a little easier to finally dispose of Zudora and then into possession of $20,000,000 Zudora mine.

Later Hassam Ali, cunningly cruel, awaits his chance. Storm, smiling and happy, enters the cheese maker's shop. It is a scene of mirth, spontaneous and real. The cheese is wrapped up and handed to Storm, with a jest by the merchant, when the door is suddenly thrown open and in rushes a squad of policemen. The diamond inventor is with them and he points an accusing finger at Storm. From beneath the coat of Hassam Ali is brought forth the diamond filled cheese Storm had previously dropped. The evidence seems complete. The policemen arrest Storm and take the merchant, despite his protests, to the station also. There the sergeant questions the principals. Storm pleads his innocence and absolute honesty throughout. The sergeant of police orders him held for further examination.

Meantime Hassam Ali is gloating over his latest little trick. Once more Storm, the sweetheart of Zudora, is in the toils and with definite evidence against him. Can he escape? Hassam Ali believes he has finally accomplished Storm's undoing. But he reckons without his skillful niece. Zudora, apprised of Storm's discomfiture, has begun her investigation. She examines the rooms of the inventor and is just beginning to inquire into the mechanism of the diamond making furnace when the aged inventor turns upon her and makes a violent attack. Zudora, young and agile, defends herself until the entrance of Hassam Ali stays further hostilities. Zudora finds quickly that the thieves who took the inventor's diamonds were uncommon practitioners in the under world. The chests were emptied of their precious stock. Cheese which had been purchased by Storm was found filled with diamonds. Who was the culprit, or was there more than one? As Zudora is surveying the inventor's rooms she hears a queer noise inside the chest. Not loud enough to be made by a man, yet a strange noise new to her and surely not belonging within the chest. Cautiously she opens the door and there is the thief. Zudora closes the door quickly. She runs out into the other rooms and summons Hassam Ali and together the door is again opened. The thief is there. Sneaking around, stopping at the faintest noise, is a mouse. And this is the culprit, for with others of its kind, this mouse had played in the great cheese vats and then down into the diamond inventor's chest and come away with the diamonds on their noses.

Zudora only accomplishes the solution of this mystery after a second dramatic struggle with the aged inventor. Zudora immediately hurries to the police station, where her sweetheart is about to be arraigned for the robbery. He is released and one more victory over her uncle is chalked up to Zudora's credit.

MRS. WIGGS OF THE CABBAGE PATCH.—Before marriage Mr. and Mrs. Wiggs were employed as coachman and housekeeper to Col. Vanderhurst. The Colonel has disinherited his son, Jack, for marrying a girl connected with circus people. A few years later Jack is killed by an accident and the widow appeals to the Colonel, but he refuses to assist her. After many years of hard struggle the widow dies, leaving Lovey Mary, a girl of fourteen, to the care of a sister, her only relative, who is married to a circus proprietor, a man of brutal temper. She gives to her sister her marriage certificate and Lovey Mary's birth certificate, and to Lovey Mary a locket containing the portraits of herself and husband. Mr. and Mrs. Wiggs have married and have five children. Owing to a strike at the works where Wiggs is employed they are suffering great hardships. The works are controlled by a millionaire politician, Murphy. His stepson, Bob, manager of the works, is in sympathy with the strikers, being especially interested in the Wiggs family, whom he helps. Murphy's nephew, Stephen, is extremely jealous of Bob and spies upon him. Stephen tells Murphy that Bob is helping the strikers and is the cause of his being discharged. Through the kindness of an old friend Bob eventually becomes a successful attorney. Mr. Wiggs determines to go to another town in search of work. He there meets Lovey Mary's uncle, the circus proprietor, and is engaged by him as ring master. Mrs. Wiggs, deserted by her husband, has a terrible struggle with poverty. Lovey Mary has been taken home to the circus by her aunt, where she leads a life of a drudge.

Several years elapse; times are harder than ever with Mrs. Wiggs and Jim, her eldest son, dies through overwork and exposure. Colonel Vanderhurst, Lovey Mary's grandfather, now old and lonely, repents of his hardness to his son's widow and makes a will in her and Lovey Mary's favor. They cannot be found so an advertisement is inserted in the papers by the lawyers. The advertisement is seen by Lovey Mary's uncle, who plots to substitute his own daughter for Lovey Mary. Wiggs has fallen in love with one of the circus performers, Cordelia, by whom he has a child named Tommy. Mary has become passionately fond of little Tommy, and when her uncle, with a view of getting her out of the way, tells her he has secured a situation for her she runs away, taking with her little Tommy rather than be parted from him. Before leaving she takes her uncle's key from his pocket while he sleeps, opens his cash box and secures the locket that her mother had given her and which he has taken from her, and also the marriage and birth certificates. Her uncle pursues her and catches her in a barn. He is about to rob her when Bob, hearing her cries, rescues her and takes her to his house. The next morning, after Bob has gone to the city, her uncle tries to get into the house and Mary, seeing him through the window is terrified—picks up little Tommy, rushes to the railroad tracks and scrambles into a freight car just on the move. Her uncle sees her escaping, too late to catch her. By fate the freight car in which Lovey Mary has traveled stops close to the cabbage patch and Billy Wiggs, noticing the forlorn little figure, takes her to his mother's house. They arrive just as Mrs. Wiggs and her three girls with the geographical names, Europenia, Asia and Australia, assisted by Chris Hazy, are in the midst of preparations for Miss Hazy and Mr. Stubbin's wedding. During the wedding festivities Lovey Mary leaves the parlor and goes into the kitchen to put little Tommy to sleep, giving him her locket to play with. As Tommy falls to sleep there is a knock at the door and Mary, going to see who it is, is kidnapped by her uncle, who, the next day, having secured the marriage and birth certificates, presents himself and daughter to claim the fortune.

The firm of lawyers representing the Colonel's estate is the one in which Bob is junior partner and he suspects that the circus proprietor is crooked and determines to watch him. He therefore journeys to where the circus is showing, which happens to be the town in which the cabbage patch is situated. While there he calls on Mrs. Wiggs. When Mary disappeared Mrs. Wiggs discovered the locket and recognized the portraits of her old master's son and his wife. She tells Bob of this and it confirms his suspicions. Stephen, still cashier at the works, has been leading a double life. Murphy discovers that his books are wrong—tells Stephen that he will examine them that night and put them in the safe. Stephen is terrified, as there are a lot of defalcations. That night he steals into the works, hides himself in Murphy's office, and when Murphy comes to examine the books stuns him, rifles the safe and sets fire to the place. Stephen, having seen Bob in town, plans to turn suspicion on him and goes to his hotel, steals into his room and hides some of the papers taken from the safe among his belongings. After Miss Hazy's wedding, Stebbins being drunk, the neighbors carry him to a freight car, thinking that he will be taken away, but before the car starts a porter discovers him and orders him off. He wanders back to town still half intoxicated, and passing the gates of the work he falls through into the yard. As he is picking himself up Stephen steals out. Stubbins speaks to him about seeing smoke coming from the building, but Stephen assures him that everything is all right and takes him to a saloon. Later when the fire occurs Stubbins accuses Stephen, who again quiets him with drink and money. Bob in disguise follows the proprietor to the gambling den, where he has hidden Mary, and after desperate dangers rescues Mary just as they are about to murder her and takes her back to Mrs. Wiggs. On the day of the fire Bob and Murphy have a quarrel publicly, and this gives rise to a rumor that the fire and Murphy's death were caused by Bob and he is therefore arrested. The police search his room and find the papers taken from the safe. He is committed for trial. The night before the trial, Stubbins, who has been drunk for a considerable period and has not heard of Bob's arrest, meets Mary and she tells him about it. He thereupon denounces Stephen and promises to appear as a witness against him the next day. Through his evidence Bob is eventually set free and Stephen takes his place. Bob and Lovey Mary are on their way to Mrs. Wiggs to tell her that they are about to get married, when they meet Wiggs and pursuade him to go back to his wife, Lovey Mary, saying that she will adopt little Tommy and Mrs. Wiggs need know nothing about Cordelia. Wiggs goes with them and is forgiven by his wife. Stubbins, having received an army pension, turns over a new leaf and goes back to Miss Hazy and the tale closes with Bob and Mary, Miss Hazy and Mr. Stubbins, Mr. and Mrs. Wiggs all happy and receiving the congratulations of the various inhabitants of the cabbage patch.

BROADWAY STAR FEATURES.

THE LOCKED DOOR (Three Parts).—Arnold Forsythe, manager of The Century Suit Company, a model concern, is informed by his son, Harold, of the dangerous conditions in the shop of The Atlas Waist Syndicate on the floor below. Forsythe interviews Jacob Emanuel, manager of the Atlas shop, and informs him that unless he remedies conditions he will report him to the Fire Department. Stella Rubinow, a worker in the Century establishment, warned several times because of her carelessness in violating a fire ordinance, is discharged and in revenge acquaints Emanuel of a defective door in the Century shop, and as a reward is given a job.

To get square with Forsythe, Emanuel writes the Fire Department about the door. Inspector Laude visits the Century shop and finds Forsythe ready and willing to adjust matters. As the inspector is leaving, Randall, Forsythe's foreman, tells him of conditions in the shop below, and, upon investigation, he finds matters even worse than reported, the most flagrant violation being a door opening in the shop and kept locked during working hours. He orders Emanuel to comply with the regulations at once. Emanuel believes that Forsythe reported him and resolves to be revenged, by setting fire to the Century shop. Waiting until night, he steals up the fire-escape and enters through a window. Collecting a pile of rags, he saturates them with oil and sets fire to the mass. His daughter, Mabel, suspicious of his actions follows him and catches him in the act.

While he makes his escape, she tries to extinguish the blazing rags. The heat from the flames starts the sprinklers and rings the automatic fire alarm, calling back Forsythe, who has just left, together with a watchman and a policeman. Emanuel, looking through a window from a fire-escape, where he had crawled, sees his daughter arrested for his crime. Harold Forsythe, believing Mabel is innocent, goes her bail and she is released, but will not divulge the name of the guilty party. On her return to the office, she has a scene with her father. Stella, listening at the office door, learns that Emanuel is the guilty one and threatens to inform the authorities if he does not buy her silence. A letter from the Fire Department warning Emanuel to make the required changes, together with the knowledge of the fact that his daughter is suspected of the crime, drives him nearly out of his mind, and he plans to burn down the building, but the continued carelessness of his foreman forestalls him. A cigarette thrown in a pile of old rags starts a fire and the inevitable panic ensues in the Atlas shop, while the flames leap about the dirty room. The workers, finding the exit door locked, rush to the fire-escape and Stella and the foreman, fighting to be the first, fall to their death. Emanuel, trapped by his own locked door, is dragged to the window by Mabel, but is fatally burned and crushed. Harold and the firemen rescue the two, but too late to save Emanuel, who, with his dying breath, clears his daughter.

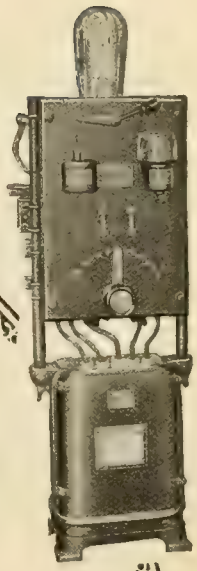
"A good investment at double the price"



Elmwood, Ill.

"The Rectifier is in first class order and the result is a wonder to me. I have visited most of the picture shows in Peoria and I can't understand why some of them don't install your rectifier; it would be a good investment at double the price you ask.

"You are at liberty to refer any one asking for particulars to me; will be glad to say a good word for rectifiers any time."

C. A. HATCHER,
Photoplay Theatre, Elmwood, Ill.

Brighter, better, non-flickering pictures are the result of a G-E Rectifier.

Bring business your way by having the reputation of "the best picture show in town."

And a G-E Rectifier will save you money on your current bills —It's "a good investment at double the price."

DAY & NIGHT SCREENS, INC.,
110 West 40th St., New York.

November 19th, 1914.

Gentlemen: I have the pleasure to report that I cannot say too much for the "Day and Night Screen" which I installed in my restaurant.

It has done not only what you said it would, but a little more. The ability of this wonderful Screen to show pictures of the most exquisite quality, bringing out the clearness of detail and tonings, with all my lights going full strength, is something that I did not expect to get.

Thanking you for your attention in helping me to get it set up, I remain,

Yours truly,
(Signed) JAMES CHURCHILL.

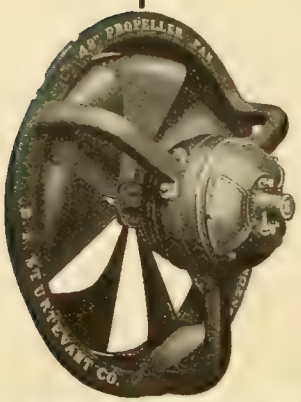
Mr. Theatre Manager:—



Sturtevant

You cannot guarantee the comfort of your patrons without perfect ventilation. This is especially true in winter when doors and windows must be closed up tight.

What you need is the Sturtevant System of Ventilation which forces the fresh air to all parts of the hall.

We have had world-wide experience in every kind of ventilation from the simplest installation to the most complex. We have heated and ventilated steamships, factories, schools, homes, offices, restaurants, engine rooms, theatres and buildings of all sizes.

We have ventilated the operator's booth in many theatres by installing Ready-to-Run Fans. In other cases our propeller fans have made a hot theatre comfortable.

Write us for descriptive circulars, mentioning this paper. Tell us the size of your building, seating capacity, doors and windows, electric current, etc., and we will make suggestions.

Mr. Exhibitor:

In buying a moving picture screen several things must be considered:

First—Quality of the Goods.
Second—The Guarantee.
Third—The Responsibility of the manufacturer back of the Guarantee.

Another Manufacturer will sell you a screen at a Price perhaps less than the cost of Mirroroide. He undoubtedly will guarantee it. But——

Will He Keep the Guarantee?

Remember you are not buying a screen every day in the week, at least you ought not to and you are not buying it for six months or a year's use. Dollars are not so plentiful that you can afford to throw them away, therefore, when you know that an article with a five-year guarantee against cracking, peeling, or turning black, said guarantee backed by a reputable business firm who have been and are still in business at the same location under the same management for the past six years, you must consider these facts and be governed accordingly.

Attendance Records Shattered AGAIN!

Thanhouser's Greatest Photoplay

AGAIN all attendance records are shattered by a Thanhouser success. This time it's Zudora—the biggest, most elaborate and most unique motion picture production that has ever been offered exhibitors. Although only three episodes have thus far been released, reports of CROWDED HOUSES come from all over America.

Zudora is the creation of Daniel Carson Goodman, author, philosopher and scientist. The novelized version of Zudora has been written by Harold MacGrath and is now appearing in hundreds of newspapers throughout the country. The motion pictures of Zudora will be presented in 20 episodes of 2 reels each. A new episode is being released each week. The cast includes Maguerite Snow, Harry Benham and James Cruze.

Exhibitors: If you want a box office attraction that is bound to draw PACKED HOUSES—Book ZUDORA. See the Thanhouser Syndicate representative at any Mutual Exchange in the United States or Canada.

THREE BEAUTIFUL XMAS PICTURES
UNIVERSAL'S OF COURSE

HERE are three beautiful Xmas stories chock full of that happy Yule Tide spirit that will send gobs of pure joy through any audience. Three human narratives, as Christmas-y as anything ever projected on the screen. Told in pictures in a beautiful way—by the cleverest of Universal Movie stars. Bristling Xmas atmosphere. Rich Xmas settings. Clever Xmas action. Three of the finest, happiest, most charming Yule tide stories ever told. Young and old alike will applaud them. Talk about them. They will pack your house. They will insure your portion of the Xmas coin to be spent this season. Book these subjects immediately. Write or wire your exchange.

Monday, December 17th (Imp),—WITHIN THE GATES OF PARADISE—A one reel subject, portraying a pathetic story of the suffering and want of a poor family—father mother and two children. Husband out of work. Can't buy Xmas things for kiddies. Gets desperate. Goes to rob wealthy man's home. Is interrupted—caught in the act—yet everything ends happy. Very dramatic. A real Xmas story beautifully told.

Wednesday, December 19th (Bison), 2 reels—THE CHRISTMAS SPIRIT—featuring Murdock MacQuarrie in a story of a wrecked human life brought back to home and family through a strange accidental meeting. A story of wandering, suffering and strange experiences of an aged man, with a most unexpected ending, which brings joy to all.

December 24th (Rex), 2 reels—THE BIG SISTER'S CHRISTMAS—an amusing yet pathetic story of a mixed up love affair of four young folks, showing the big heartedness and the sacrifice the big sister was willing to make to bring joy to her younger sister. There's a fire, a rescue, plenty of dandy love scenes, and as usual everything ends up with that Universal punch that sends everybody away happy.

George Randolph Chester and Lillian Chester are the authors of Runaway June. It is their best work.

Runaway June is not a serial but a serial series. Each installment is a complete story dealing with the most vital problem of life.

The most wonderful cast ever seen in pictures will appear in Runaway June. Over sixty members are in the Stock Company.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 13

There is a remarkable double characterization in the poetic picture story

The Old Maid

A production that should prove itself an artistic creation of exceptional merit, suggested in part by the beautiful poem, "Dorothy in the Garret," by John Townsend Trowbridge. In the cast Blanche Sweet, Mary Alden, Spottiswoode Aitken and Jack Conway.

MAJESTIC AND KOMIC GUIDE FOR EXHIBITORS

(In which we try to tell only the truth about all Majestic and Komic releases)

THE OLD GOOD-FOR-NOTHING (1 Reel Majestic) Release date Tuesday, Dec. 1—A delightful character comedy drama in which Spottiswoode Aitken plays the part of the lovable old inventor who is thought to be "good-for-nothing" but who finally wins out gloriously.

A QUESTION OF COURAGE (2 Reel Majestic) Release date Sunday, Dec. 6—A strong, virile picture-drama, reasonably well produced, telling the story of a mother who bravely gave two sons to the war but rebelled when it came to losing the third son.

MR. HADLEY'S UNCLE (1 Reel Komic) Release date Sunday, Dec. 6—This is No. 12 of the famous "Bill" stories by Paul West, published in 20 Sunday newspapers in the larger cities. It is an excellent number.

HER BRAVE HERO (1 Reel Majestic) Release date Tuesday, Dec. 8—A fair farce comedy, but not quite up to standard. Hubby becomes a hero under false pretences.

IN WILDMAN'S LAND (1 Reel Majestic) Release date Friday, Dec. 11—A comedy drama quite out of the ordinary, cleverly produced and acted, telling a weird story of a strange tribe of wild people.

THE OLD MAID (2 Reel Majestic) Release date Sunday, Dec. 13—An unusual, artistic offering, especially recommended for the higher class houses, featuring Blanche Sweet. The "Old Maid" recalls the story of the youth.

THE HOUSEBREAKERS (1 Reel Komic) Release date Sunday, Dec. 13—Above the average Komic. Eddie Dillon as the timid sweetheart proves his courage.

Gertrude McCoy An Edison Success

GERTRUDE McCOY'S entire motion picture experience has been with the Edison Company. She makes an instantaneously successful appeal through her personal charms; but her final claim to distinctive recognition lies in the deep sincerity with which she enacts her every part; nothing is slighted in her acting.

GERTRUDE McCOY as "THE STENOGRAPHER"

(The first of a number of Edison films designed to portray the temptations of a girl who earns her own living). She is confronted with a terrible alternative—she must either pursue a course of action that is dishonorable or be thrown out of employment. The situation is further complicated by the fact that she falls in love with the business rival of her employer. The story is far from commonplace and yet its lessons are universal. The action is fine; the moral tone invigorating and refined because strength of character goes hand in hand with high dramatic ability.

GERTRUDE McCOY as "MARY" in "THE BIRTH OF OUR SAVIOUR"

She also plays the important part of "Mary" in this forthcoming Edison Christmas film. Here her delineation of the character of "Mary" is beautifully done and calls for much praise.

GERTRUDE McCOY as "CECILIA" in "THE BEST MAN"

Still again, she plays another part, that of "Cecelia," in "The Best Man," another forthcoming Edison Holiday film. In this film she appears as fiancee and bride, with Marc MacDermott as the real and the counterfeit bridegroom. The situation is a difficult one, but Gertrude McCoy fully meets the requirements and gives us another evidence of her fine dramatic appreciation of the character she assumes.

Facts and Comments

A NOTORIOUS Thespian who has lately asked the public to buy a book devoted to his varied quintuple matrimonial experience is credited with an "intense hatred for the moving pictures." In an interview with the reporter of a newspaper on the Pacific coast the more or less distinguished actor says that "moving pictures are like groceries to me." He is also credited with saying that "only cheap people who do not think, go to them." This particular artist himself tempted fortune via the camera and the recollection of it is painful, even to this day, to all who were connected with the effort.

IN a small city in the Middle West the three exhibitors catering to moving picture patrons have agreed to try, for a month, the closing of two of the theaters and holding all shows at the third theater, which is the largest of the three. Should the month's trial prove satisfactory, the plan will be continued until the first of June when the other two theaters will be reopened to provide for the crowds of the summer season. The manifestation of such a spirit of co-operation is highly commendable and in refreshing contrast to the wasteful and ignorant competition which has cost so much money and agony of soul to exhibitors since the beginning of the industry.

ANOTHER little warning against the multiplying stock-jobbing propositions with a moving picture background seems to be in order. We have read all sorts of promoting literature within the last week or two and if but ten per cent of it is true, investments in oil-wells are not half as profitable as moving pictures. Without exception, the statements in the prospectuses we have seen are wildly and perhaps wilfully exaggerated. We are often asked for advice on the financial standing of new entrants into the field and on the advisability of investment generally. THE MOVING PICTURE WORLD has without fear or favor stated facts in regard to various stock-selling enterprises and in response to many inquiries touching the chances of investment in moving pictures it can do no more than repeat its warning against such investment without a very thorough investigation made by reliable persons. If there are any people who have recently got-rich-quick through investments in motion pictures they have escaped our attention.

NOW it seems Canada's turn to be "spy-mad." One of the victims of its nervous suspicion is none other than the Kalem Company, which in a dispatch to a New York daily, from Ottawa, is described as a "German company" which, under pretense of taking motion pictures, went to Canada and established "a secret store of arms on the Isle of New Orleans in the St. Lawrence River, just off Quebec." It will be remembered that the Kalem Company sent a large force to the Island of Orleans to enact as realistically as possible "The Fall of Quebec." The inhabitants of several Canadian villages in the neighborhood were hired as supers. The feature was one of the biggest of its kind and was exhibited both in this country and Canada. Now we hear it reported from Canada that all this film work was sheer pretense and that "advantage was taken of opportunity to land guns and secrete them in pits which were carefully covered." We also learn that "so far as the Canadian military authorities have been able to learn the films made last summer never were shown." What a lot of old Rips the Canadian military authorities must be. Seriously speaking, this taking of liberties with moving picture companies, to feed fake news to helpless readers, ought to be stopped and we hope that the Kalem Company will make an example of the paper which prints such rot.

PERSISTENT rumors point to a cigarette as the cause of a recent film fire in this city. The burning cigarette, it is reported, was thrown away by a man who should have known much better. There are film offices where the floors are kept scrupulously clean from stray bits of film and where the rule against smoking is enforced strictly and with no respect to persons. There are other offices in which, to say the least, different conditions prevail. We have seen old experienced film men and operators smoke in projection and film rooms as if precaution were entirely needless. The smoking of tobacco, and especially in cigarettes, should be made disorderly conduct and punished accordingly. Such a measure would be in the line of prevention and prevention must always be the chief aim in dealing with dangers from fire.

By W. Stephen Bush.

"THE Line Above the Average" is today watched anxiously by all exhibitors who have gone into their profession on a large scale and who have critical audiences to please. The higher the price of admission the more intelligent and the more exacting will be the criticism. The result is an eager searching for the thin line above the average.

It will be admitted by all who are acquainted with the history of motion pictures that the average has improved year after year. I can at this moment name scores of features which today are considered very ordinary, but which would have been acclaimed masterpieces three and four years ago. The multiple reel as such had an advantage over the single reel. Padding was scarcely recognized then as a sin while today the public is intolerant of even the slightest attempt at stretching a story beyond its proper length.

As the general average of quality traveled upward, the line above the average soared along with or rather over it. There are thousands of motion picture theaters where the average will bring the business. These theaters may be slowly decreasing in number, but they will be in a majority for many years to come. It is the big theater which must offer something better than the average. We have seen the presentation of motion pictures develop into a science and here, too, the line is sharply drawn between the average and the line above the average. The most important factor, however, must always be the picture itself. No perfume has ever been invented which will change the native flavor of the untamed brier into the balmy fragrance of Arabia. To put it more prosaically: cheese will always be cheese, no matter how prepared and no matter how preserved.

This brings us to the question: How strong is the line above the average? Undoubtedly the pronounced tendency toward the open market has helped to create a certain supply of quality above the average. Old conditions favored a large output of average films; the newcomer was bound to offer, or at least try to offer, something above this average. The distribution of the regular average productions within the organized groups had been placed on a good working basis while the new producer had to find his own market amid a hundred serious handicaps. These handicaps could be reduced only by quality above the average. Quality will find a way even in a market which is exceptionally well covered and well fenced in. All of which goes to show that an open or even a partially open market will favor and even force quality. Nor can it be denied that the professed specialists of quality have met with a decided competition in point of quality by the older producers. A result of all this activity has been a strengthening of the line above the average.

Is the supply of this product which is obviously above the average large enough to warrant an exhibitor to go into the open market, to reject all attempted restrictions and depend on what tomorrow will bring forth? These are questions that must deeply concern every exhibitor who is interested in giving his patrons the best the market affords. Conditions at this time are really too chaotic to allow of any definite assurance in any direction. Even in the matter of quality-features changed but once a week, the question of quantity cannot be left out of consideration. It is difficult to comprehend how one concern will be able to furnish the steady flow of things above the average to the exclusion of all others.

No man and no group of men have ever had or ever can have a monopoly of masterpieces. Every art proves this fact overwhelmingly. The greatest galleries of the world show paintings and statuary from many hands. In literature and on the speaking stage the same laws obtain. Art is made up of the excellencies of many minds and of many hands. There is no reason to expect that this law will work out differently in the world of dramatic kinematography. Indeed, it may be safely asserted that the greater the art the more numerous and the more various will be the contributions to art.

The history of the motion picture in this country and abroad teaches this one unmistakable lesson: The greater the freedom of choice to the exhibitor the better for the progress of the entire industry. In Europe especially there has been a signal failure of the attempt to force the exhibitor into taking the things he did not want. In this country the exhibitor is winning this freedom slowly and very often the stronger men win it for themselves and incidentally for the weaker men. Only through an absolutely free choice in an open market can we work to the top of the ladder financially, ethically and artistically.

Talking to a group of old film men the other day, the writer was assured that plans for the fullest independence and emancipation of the big motion picture theaters were under way. It was pointed out that right here in the East, within a radius of less than two hundred miles from New York City, there are twenty theaters strong enough to run uniform programs of proven excellence. It was proposed to take a program such as is offered in the principal motion picture theaters in this city and have it go the rounds of, say, twenty first-class theaters. The amount of bookings thus secured for such a program is considerable enough to make it the business and the ambition of producers to get their products on the program. The profits are obvious, likewise the prestige. There would no longer be any necessity for these twenty theaters to depend upon one source of supply nor could they be forced to do so. They would at once constitute an unfailing market for the line above the average and thus encourage and stimulate quality in production.

Nor is there any doubt that the same policy can be followed all through the country. England's great picture palaces, as they are called, are supplied through such channels which in the nature of things will always absorb what is best. Such a plan would likewise simplify the great problem of distribution which even at this moment is far from being solved. At present the facility of distribution is often responsible for the financial success of poor products while the lack of facility often seriously hampers the progress of the picture of quality.

It has long been the ideal of the best friends of the industry to see it established on a foundation of quality. From the very earliest days The Moving Picture World has voiced this ideal. It seems that we are at last approaching the realization of our ideal. Quality is clearly in the ascendant and its commercial value is being vindicated every day. Indeed it is difficult to see how the splendid new theaters now existing or in course of erection and exclusively devoted to motion pictures can make any money without a constant accession of quality plus quantity. It is a well known fact that even one or two poor pictures in a series of otherwise superior quality will result in a marked and immediate decrease in patronage. Let us hope the line above the average will grow stronger day by day.

War Stories

By Louis Reeves Harrison.

THERE is little doubt that President Wilson's admonitions have done good in moderating expression of opinion, though not one honest conviction about the European war be altered. The President's counsel was politic in the very best sense—it advised prudence during a world crisis—and it has been generally respected. The drift of some press headings is plainly biased, but both sides of the question have been presented in leading periodicals, and our people are disposed to be fair to all forces engaged in the great conflict. We are, in fact, feeding the just and the unjust from purest kindness of heart, from sympathy with those in dire misery, but the silent vote, outside of our ten per cent. of foreign population, is almost unanimous. There is a widespread conviction among sixty or seventy million Americans of colonial or revolutionary descent that there are principles involved in this war in which we are deeply concerned, and a strong feeling exists that such principles should not be submerged because of politic neutrality.

On the other hand, doubts have been raised as to the advisability of showing stories on the screen which depict the victory of one side engaged in the European War and defeat of the other. There are too many complications involved for immediate solution, though it would seem that sincerity of purpose might determine what pictures should be shown. The playwright might be as sincere as Sophocles, yet have his intentions perverted during the process of visualization, and the play must ring true in its complete form, not a lot of flag flaunting for the sake of a hurrah, to win confidence and make a serious appeal to an audience, and it seems as though there should be a principle involved.

A way out of present complications suggests itself in the idea of setting apart the great principles involved from their application. The fundamental doctrines and tenets of our form of government, as opposed to rules of caste and force, may be powerfully contrasted in other wars, even those of ancient times, and the natural sense justice pervading all classes of people would be as deeply touched, though less in evidence. This has the disadvantage of requiring a much higher class of play than has yet been shown on the screen. Only a professional writer familiar with screen requirements could formulate such a play with any chance of success.

Another, and simpler, way out is to tell a good story, one able to stand on its own merits, and then use the war as a background, irrespective of the nationality of combatants. We may enjoy watching the movements of troops because of the animated action involved, but even that grows tiresome when it is without significant bearing on a character, or a phase of life in which we have become interested. An ordinary play may gain in variety by the injection of military action, and the latter may contribute heavily in working up to a big scene, but the best that can result from exhibiting military dramas is that which may grow out of the war itself, the abolition of harsh methods in settling international disputes.

It is just as well to recognize the fact that warfare has been a tremendous factor in the development of civilization. Survival among primitive races has often been one of ferocity. The American Indian of peaceful growth toward civilization was all but exterminated by the fiercest and most cruel of his race, and these savages had to be conquered in turn that this fair continent might play a part in world growth. We have been constantly fighting during our existence as a nation, and even for that existence, not because we believed in settling questions by physical force, but because there was no way of establishing the great principles for which we stand as a people through appeal to some impartial tribunal.

There are principles involved in the present European war, and mightiest of these principles is that the great countries in conflict should so agree among themselves as to establish orderly relationship that their common people, those who are doing the real fighting, may enjoy a measure of happiness which is their due. As long as territorial greed and race hatred are deliberately fostered by caste and militarism, no civilized country of peaceful aspirations can exist in a condition of security, so it may turn out that a test of endurance to the point of exhaustion will result in the abolishment of war and self-constituted governing power along with it.

We are bound to consider that there are varying circumstances surrounding national questions in which justice may quite as well be tempered with severity as with mercy. We must also consider that we have a concrete self-interest in this war, though it be far removed from our shores. Our business interests, and therefore our common interests, are so distributed throughout the world that the disastrous conditions abroad are deeply felt, as in the case of cotton planters, by great numbers of our people engaged in quiet occupations at home. Hence it would seem that any screen publication dealing with the uniformed soldiers now fighting in Europe should be handled with delicacy, that they may not contribute to aggravate or prolong what the whole world deplores.

From a high viewpoint, one comprehensive enough to take in the larger issues at stake, it must be seen that international relationships have grown to a complicated fabric of vast political social and business interests. The questions to be settled by this conflict among civilized European countries are of the most important kind. Millions of our people realize all this, just as you do and I do, and to trifle with so grave a crisis in history will not please the more intelligent portion of moving picture theaters. A war picture that is set before millions must give consideration to what is in the minds of people who have not only suffered materially from the war, but who are bound to be profoundly affected at its termination.

Glance at some of the questions to arise. The war is sure to end, but will militarism end? Will not great armies be maintained? Cannot great armies be maintained to the benefit, rather than to the detriment, of peace? There are admirable services to be performed, sometimes duties indispensible to the welfare of a nation, by organized bodies of men not actually engaged in productive industry. There may be many excellent qualities fostered in military training, such as disciplining those who are manly enough in a way, but who confuse liberty and license. Is it not possible to suppress war, yet preserve the finer mental and physical qualities of the fighting spirit?

War stories may be so constructed as to encourage lofty principles. They may be so presented as to emphasize the destructive evils of war, or so as to broaden narrow minds, even to make poignant and searching appeals for the cause of humanity against the selfish interests of autocracy. As such they would be worth while.

Standard Polyscope Corporation

Organized to Promote New Picture Program in Conjunction with the Standard Association—Hoagland Is General Manager.

WHILE it would seem that the possibility of the market to absorb more picture programs than are already offered by existing combinations had been stretched about to the limit and that further production would result in serious demoralization of an apparently over-burdened demand, there is nothing lacking in confidence on the part of promoters who profess to see a clear road to success for their plans. Yet, there is no telling what may be accomplished along these lines when sufficient capital and energy are coupled with an astute knowledge of the motion picture trade in its several aspects and a determination to beat someone else to the home stake.

With this observation the Moving Picture World introduces the Standard Polyscope Corporation of New York City, incorporated under the laws of the state of New York with a capital of $1,000,000, for the purpose of assembling and distributing a new picture program, operating in conjunction with the recently organized Standard Program Association, which has its headquarters in Chicago.

Ordinarily this announcement would cause little more than a broad smile among old-time members of the trade who have become used to that sort of thing; but there are certain elements in this latest organization that must be seriously considered and given due measure of importance in any forecast of the ultimate result of the venture. It will be found to number among its sponsors men of wide and well tried experience in all branches of the business of making and distributing motion pictures. One of the directors of the corporation is Herbert Blache, who has been unusually successful as a maker of pictures and who is in close touch with the market conditions, both foreign and domestic. Another name, probably not so widely known at present, but one that will be heard of from this on, is that of Herbert C. Hoagland, a director and the general manager of the new corporation, until very recently general manager of Pathe Freres. Wm. P. Cooper, president of the corporation, is comparatively unknown to the trade at large, yet Mr. Cooper is familiar with the various branches of the trade and probably has a wider personal knowledge of the motion picture studios of the world than any other man in the business. But this is meat for another story.

Regarding Mr. Hoagland, the general manager of the new concern, there is much to be said, inasmuch as nothing has ever been said about him in print before. Six years ago he entered the employ of Pathe Freres as advertising man, working under the direction of J. A. Berst, vice-president and American representative of the French company. With the organization and subsequent development of the American Pathe Company, Mr. Hoagland was successively promoted to the position of general manager of that company, enjoying the trust and esteem of Mr. Berst and his several successors and even Mr. Charles Pathe, head of all the Pathe interests, who is now personally directing the affairs of the American company. The honors and responsibilities thrust upon Mr. Hoagland by the Pathe Company were fully merited by his knowledge of the business and his ability to conduct its far-reaching interests. Every phase of motion picture production and distribution became as an open book to him and few men in the business have a surer knowledge of the needs of the market, here and abroad, than he possesses. Suffice it for the present to say that when Mr. Hoagland's contributions to the motion picture business have been fully enumerated he will be found to measure up in point of achievement with most of the accredited big men of the trade. So much for the personal element.

In point of capital invested or obtainable, there seems to be no lack of it. President Cooper brings large financial backing to the company along with his technical knowledge.

Yet other big names are to be added to the directorate which will further bulwark its finances, so that if capital and experience mean anything the Standard Polyscope Corporation ought to have an even chance in the fight for business.

In an interview with President Cooper, the representative of the Moving Picture World learned nothing definite regarding the source of supply of pictures. It was stated that tenders had been made by a number of producing companies, but that contracts had not been signed with any up to the present time. Both President Cooper and General Manager Hoagland expressed the belief that there would be a large offering to select from when the time for selection came, and a determination as well, to take the best offering. Regarding other important details of the organization no information was forthcoming. "But we are all ready," exclaimed Mr. Hoagland, "and I know the men I want and their telephone addresses."

Present at the little conference which took place on the fourteenth floor of the Trinity Building, was W. A. Hopp, of Chicago, brother of Joseph Hopp, president of the Standard Program Association. Mr. Hopp could give no further information regarding the exchanges to be associated in the organization than has already been published in the Moving Picture World. Some twenty-two or twenty-five distributing points will be designated and the officers of the association are now busy apportioning the territory among the various members. It is announced, though, that everything will be ready for business January 18. Then watch the fur fly.

Lee Arthur

IT is with a feeling of considerable pride and great satisfaction that the Edison Company announce the conclusion of negotiations with Lee Arthur, the well-known playwright, by which they shall have the exclusive use of his works for the Edison pictures. Mr. Arthur's fame is international and he, today, easily ranks with the foremost American playwrights. A native of Shreveport, La., he attended the Tulane University, from which he graduated with the degree of L. L. D. After devoting several years to the practice of law in the city of New Orleans, he abandoned the profession for playwriting. Having traveled extensively as a student of the technique of the drama, he wrote his first play, "The Gay Mr. Lightfoot," which proved a tremendous success upon the initial presentation in New York. This was followed by the "We-uns of Tennessee," in which Chas. Hanford starred for two years, and "The Auctioneer," with David Warfield. It was then the bright star of genius began to illuminate the theatrical world and Lee Arthur was chosen by Klaw & Erlanger and Mark Twain to make a dramatization of "Huckleberry Finn" and "Tom Sawyer." Among other plays that originated from the pen of Lee Arthur may be mentioned "Cohen's Luck" with Joe Welch, "Breaking Into Society" with the four Mortons, "Van Allen's Wife" with Fannie Ward and "Putting It Over," which was considered by all critics to be the best baseball play ever written. He has placed this season "A Little Nugget" with Dan Frohman, "The Baby of the Family" and "The Morning After," which the Shuberts will produce after the holidays.

Lee Arthur.

In engaging the services of a writer of such high calibre the Edison Company have added an important link to their chain of authors of world-wide reputation. Mr. Arthur's first production for the screen is "The Last of the Hargroves," which will shortly be released by the Edison Company.

ARBUCKLE HONORARY MEMBER OF FRISCO'S SCREEN CLUB.

Roscoe Arbuckle, of Keystone fame, has been spending the past week in San Francisco and has been the guest of the Screen Club, of San Francisco. He has been made the first honorary member of this organization and expects to remain here until after the motion picture industry ball to be held at the Coliseum. In speaking of his visit, Mr. Arbuckle states that he has never been entertained so royally before and hopes that arrangements may be made whereby some Keystone work may be done in San Francisco.

Screeners' Ball Highly Successful

Third Annual Function Attended by a Host of the Industry's Prominent Men and Women.

THE third annual ball of the Screen Club, which was held in the grand ballroom of the Hotel Astor on Thanksgiving Eve, was largely attended by men and women prominent in the trade. It was distinctively a motion picture function, and in a social way marked the high-water line of similar affairs. For that matter, there is every reason to believe that when all returns are in it will be found that the ball was unusually successful financially.

The throngs began to arrive shortly after 9 o'clock. Among the early comers were Nicholas Power, Frank Dyer and Edwin Earle, treasurer of the Power company. "Pop" Lubin came over from Philadelphia with a large personal party. It did not take him long to locate "Pop" Rock, president of the Vitagraph company, and the two were pretty close during the night, barring that time the magnate of Lubinville tripped the light fantastic. Speaking about dancing, it was a matter of comment that Daniel Frohman missed one number of the program—there were twenty-four dances. The committee has been endeavoring to learn what was wrong with the one banned. Mr. Frohman, talking with President James Kirkwood, unstintedly praised the occasion. Charles C. Baumann, Adolph Zukor, Adam and Charles Kessel, C. A. ("Doc") Willat, Louis J. Selznick, J. Searle Dawley, Abe Warner, J. Parker Read, Mark Dintenfass, William Swanson, A. Carlos, Herbert Blache and Mme. Blache, G. Blake Garrison, James C. Graham, Harry Palmer, Joe Brandt and Thomas Davison, of London, were others among those noted. E. H. Horstmann came over from Boston to talk about the ball to be given on Dec. 2 by the Massachusetts exhibitors.

The players were present in force. There were thirty-five or more from the Vitagraph studio alone. There seemed to be a score from Lubinville. Romaine Fielding brought a party with him. Arthur Johnson, who never misses a Screen club festivity, was along. Marc MacDermott and Miriam Nesbitt were in the Edison box. Clara Kimball Young and James Young were among the representatives of the Peerless. Among the littler players Katherine and Jane Lee received a lot of attention. To sum up, there were a few, a very few, players absent; and judging from what was said by those who came early and remained late the absentees were the losers.

The guests were greeted on their arrival by two men arrayed as town criers—Puritanical garb, lantern and bell and all accessories. Into the hand of each newcomer was placed a proclamation signed by the officers of the Screen Club in which all were bidden to dance and make merry. The typography was of old English, the paper was of the brown, butchers' variety, the printing was in two colors, and the seal of the club was attached.

The grand march was led by President Kirkwood and Miss Mary Pickford. During the progress of the evolutions there were novel light effects engineered by Will C. Smith. One of the most striking was the flooding of the floor and the dancers with moving figures of the American flag in colors. Later President Kirkwood presented, on behalf of the club, former President King Baggot with a life membership, together with a gold life membership card, suitably engraved.

It was late when the dancing ceased. Many of the members of the club and their guests adjourned to the clubhouse, where informality ruled. There were singing and dancing and dining. Among those responsible for the success of the evening—that is, aside from the membership of the club—were Jacob H. Gerhardt, treasurer of the ball committee; Jule Burnstein, who had in charge the rental of the boxes and who also selected the gold card presented to Mr. Baggot as well as the souvenirs given to the women attending—the latter a neat pin in the center of which was the emblem of the club, and First Vice-President Ben Wilson, who took charge of the printing and the arrangements for the grand march.

The boxholders were Mark Dintenfass, Vitagraph, Thanhouser, Ben Wilson, Universal, J. Searle Dawley, Edison, Nicholas Power, Moving Picture World, Fred Poppe, Anthony Kelly and Hugh Hoffman, World Film, K. and C. Booking, Miss Helen Gardner and Charles Gaskill, King Baggot, Jule Burnstein and Alan Hale, William Fox, Frank Tichenor, Adolph Zukor, James Kirkwood, M. J. Shear, of Solax; Romaine Fielding, Tiffany Corporation, Jesse L. Lasky, All Star, Lubin, Alco; Excelsior and Favorite Players; O. A. C. Lund, Alex Francis and George Powl; Alliance, Peerless and New York Motion Picture Company.

FRANK BORSAGE IN "THE PANTHER."

Frank Borsage does some splendid acting in "The Panther," a stirring north woods narrative soon to be released by the companies of Thomas H. Ince. He portrays the part of a young hunter who becomes the hounded victim of a tyrant's cruelty just because he has befriended a girl by marrying her. Most of the scenes were taken in Bear Valley, Cal., under the direction of Walter Edwards.

A Pearce and Scheck Enterprise

The Hippodrome, Largest Theater in South, Opens at Baltimore—C. E. Lewis Is Manager.

THE Hippodrome, one of the biggest theaters in the South, and in part devoted to motion pictures, was opened in Baltimore on Monday, November 23. This splendid new house which has a seating capacity about equal to that of the Strand in New York is situated west of Eutaw street just above Baltimore street and is the property of the well-known firm, Pearce and Scheck, who have been identified with the motion picture industry from the very earliest times and who built up a great business in the pioneer days of the South. Motion pictures and vaudeville constituted the program which was most enthusiastically received by the audience.

C. E. Lewis.

The theater itself was the object of general admiration. The prevailing tones in the scheme of decoration are brown and gold tastefully mixed. The proscenium opening is forty-three feet wide, the largest of any theater in the South. The very latest inventions for the improvement of ventilation are in use at the theater, the air being changed every four minutes. The building had been designed by the well-known architect, Thomas W. Lamb. A pipe organ has been installed to the value of ten thousand dollars. All the employes (there are fifty-four of them) wear a distinct uniform, combining a peculiar shade of gray with red. The cloth for this uniform has been specially manufactured in a Northern mill for the Hippodrome and is marked as "The Hippodrome-Own Spun." The most modern devices have been used to insure the best projection possible. The Gold Fiber Screen is used. Marble plays a prominent part in the interior architecture. There is no brass in the house; all rails are of wood with joints of polished bronze.

The management of the house will be in the hands of C. E. Lewis, who has for some time past been actively associated with the enterprises of Pearce and Scheck.

"While we must use vaudeville in the Hippodrome," said Mr. Lewis, "we intend to make much of the picture part of our program and if we find the public responsive to a first-class presentation of excellent motion pictures we intend to give them more of it."

FILM STORAGE AND EXHIBITION BUILDING PROJECTED.

Plans are under way for the ultimate erection on a site adjacent to the film center of a large building which will be devoted to motion picture purposes. The breaking out of the European war seriously retarded the progress of negotiations, but the officers of a syndicate behind the movement believe the delay will be only temporary. One of the strong talking points behind the proposition is the growing disposition of the Fire Department to increase the restrictions surrounding the handling of film. It is said that one-half of the capital necessary for construction work is in sight, and that it is designed to secure the remainder from film men. The plan is similar to that of co-operative apartments, in so far as each shareholder may extend his space by purchase of additional stock or in the case of going out of business may sub-let.

The building is to be at a point where the best railroad facilities are available, both as regards New Jersey, New York and Long Island. It is designed that the construction shall be undertaken in co-operation with the Fire Department. One of the features outlined is an exhibition arena, where many films may be shown simultaneously. Another is for extensive film storage vaults.

Socialist Defies Pittsburgh Police

Wheeler Says Moving Pictures Will Be Shown on Sabbath Despite Police Orders.

ROBERT J. WHEELER, the Socialist member of the Allentown, Pa., City Council, in speaking to a crowd of Socialists, which filled the Lyceum theater, Pittsburgh, Pa., the night of Sunday, November 22, from pit to dome, said, referring to the ban put on the Socialists' Sunday pictures at the Lyceum: "Go ahead and give your moving pictures and let the police arrest you, if they so choose. Then take the matter into the courts. I have too great confidence in the average court of justice to believe that it would lend itself to petty police persecution or the suppression of free speech, when such assemblages are orderly and do not conflict with the peaceful pursuits of the community."

Carl Jasaurek was chairman of the meeting and announced that moving pictures would be shown in the Lyceum theater by the Socialists Sunday, November 29, and "anyone attempting to stop them would be arrested for interfering with a public meeting."

Mr. Wheeler was in Pittsburgh to speak under the auspices of the local Socialist party. He is a forceful talker and had the house with him at all times. Mr. Wheeler said he could not understand why so many policemen "are chosen from the people who might well have lived in the third century."

"So they won't allow you to show moving pictures, eh?" he asked. "If it were a 'booze' joint, it probably would be given police protection. Americans won't stand for the suppression of free speech—the police ought to have sense enough to know that. I will wager that Director Hubbard already has been properly rebuked by his political sponsors for having interfered with Socialist pictures in this house."

Applause followed the addresses and, in spite of police orders, a moving picture show of Milton's "Paradise Lost" will be put on in this theater Sunday, November 29.

It has been reported that the police will not attempt forcibly to stop the showing of the moving pictures in the Lyceum theater on Sunday, November 29, by the Socialist party, according to Charles S. Hubbard, Director of Public Safety, but the following days information will be lodged against those in charge, and a test case will be the result.

BELASCO GIVES HIS "O K."

Following the private presentation of "The Rose of the Rancho," Lasky's motion picture version of the Belasco dramatic production of the same title, David Belasco wrote this letter of commendation to Samuel Goldfish, of the Lasky Company:

My Dear Mr. Goldfish:

It was like a dream to me to sit in my theater last night and see my production of "The Rose of the Rancho" unfolded in all its beautiful color and with all its dramatic action. The motion pictures of the scenes of old California, which your firm went to such great pains to obtain at their very fountain-head, are most life-like. You have caught the very shadows of the land of my childhood. My enthusiasm could not be greater, and I congratulate the Lasky Company on its wonderful work. Needless to say, I was your most exacting critic at the first showing of the pictures last night; but I am forced to admit that I think it the most perfect motion picture play I have ever seen, and I look forward with much anticipation to your forthcoming motion pictures of all my plays. Faithfully yours,

(Signed) DAVID BELASCO.

MICHIGAN EXHIBITORS AID "SAFETY FIRST" MOVEMENT.

At a meeting of the Michigan Exhibitors held in their club rooms in the Equity Building, Detroit, Mich., November 24, the members went on record as being in favor of the "Safety First" movement and they offered every aid to help along the good work. The members were instructed by President Jeup to charge admission price to the censors which, it is understood, will be directed by the Detroit Federation of Women's Club to visit the motion picture houses and to pass upon them, making report of those which they find to be below the standard. Mr. Jeup made it plain that the women who would do this work were not officially authorized and that there was no reason why the courtesy of free admission should be extended to them.

The association discussed the matter of raffles, and it was announced that two theaters were stopped from carrying on such lottery. The association also has put the ban on free matinees. The association wants a big attendance at the coming meeting in December, which will be held on the fifteenth at the clubrooms. Many legislative matters are to come up and it is urgently requested that every motion picture exhibitor in the state be present, to take part in the important discussions. President Jeup reports that ten new members out in the state have joined the association and three in Detroit.

A Wide Loophole

"A Coach and Four" Can Drive Through the Ohio Censor Law.

AN EXAMINATION of the Ohio Censor Law must convince any reader that it was drawn and enacted with an eye upon the creation of jobs and not for the protection of the public if such protection was needed.

Sections one, two and three deal strictly with the creation of the Board and payment of salaries, and each section is carefully prepared.

Section four and seven are the only ones dealing with the real subject of censoring. Said sections read as follows:

Section 4. Only such films as are in the judgment and discretion of the board of censors of a moral, educational or amusing and harmless character shall be passed and approved by such board. They shall be stamped or designated in an appropriate manner and consecutively numbered. Before any motion picture film shall be publicly exhibited, there shall be projected upon the screen the words "Approved by the Ohio Board of Censors" and the number of the film.

Section 7. Any person, firm or corporation who shall publicly exhibit or show any motion picture within the state of Ohio unless it shall have been passed, approved and stamped by the Ohio board of censors or the congress of censors shall upon conviction thereof, be fined not less than twenty-five ($25.00) dollars nor more than three hundred ($300.00) dollars, or imprisoned not less than thirty days nor more than one year, or both, for each offense.

It will be noted that section four has two points in view. First, duty of the censors, and second, duties of exhibitors.

Now it must be conceded that it would be a waste of time and money to censor films if there was not some way provided by which the public and police officials could readily detect a violation of the law. For it would be useless to censor if no provision is made to punish and thereby prohibit the exhibition of uncensored film. An attempt was made in the Ohio law to cover this point by making the law read in the last part of section four. Before any motion picture shall be exhibited there shall be projected upon the screen the "Approved by the Ohio Board of Censors" (in yellow). But section seven the penal clause of the statue only provides a penalty for showing uncensored film and fails to provide a penalty for failure to show upon the screen the Approval of the Board. Hence the only way to make a conviction under this statue would be to call the Censor Board into each and every case with their records. An impossibility.

The above analysis of the law was fully developed in the case of the State of Ohio vs. Sam Bullock, tried in the Municipal Court of Cleveland before Judge Fielder Sanders, the state being represented by James Reyant.

The facts, briefly stated, are as follows:

Mr. Bullock exhibited five reels of pictures without leaders (that is, a piece of film showing approval of censor board).

He was arrested charged with exhibiting an uncensored film. A policeman testified to his visiting the picture show conducted by Bullock, of seeing film shown without the leader, and that it happened in County and State.

Only one question was asked by defense:

"Do you, Mr. Officer, know of your own knowledge whether the film you saw had been censored or not?"

Answer: "I do not. I only know it had no leader."

The State rested its case, whereupon defendants moved to discharge on the ground that failure to show leader carried no penalty. Motion was granted. The above shows with what absolute abandon of rights of taxpayers and with what heedlessness bills are passed in the legislature to create positions for office seekers. Other points in this law are subject to consideration.

FEDERATION OF WOMEN'S CLUBS DETROIT'S CENSOR.

The Detroit Federation of Women's Clubs will take charge of the censorship of moving picture shows, pending the active organization of the recreation committee, provided by the charter amendment adopted in the recent election. A committee of club women called on Secretary of Police George A. Walters, of Detroit, on Saturday, November 12, and an agreement was reached whereby the censorship until further notice would be in charge of a special committee appointed by the president of the club. The volunteer censors will visit all moving picture theaters, as well as vaudeville theaters, each censor to be given a district to look after, and make a report to the police department of any improper films. Co-operation of the police department in suppressing such films was assured by Mr. Walters, who explained that the reason the department had no regular censor was due to the board of estimators, who would not grant the necessary funds. When the police budget was submitted for the year starting July, last, provision was made for the employment of a censor at $1,200 a year, an assistant censor at $1,000 and a moving picture operator at $1,000, to view all pictures and make eliminations of objectionable features. This part of the budget was slashed by the estimators, and as a result Official Censor Lester Potter quit censoring. The Detroit Federation of Women's Clubs object to the crime pictures shown at "special performances" for children Saturday afternoons.

Picture Actors' Lives Endangered

High Wave Dashes Schooner and Dory Containing Four Seafaring Men Posing as Actors Upon Rocks of Gloucester, Mass.

THE lives of four embryo moving picture actors were endangered at Gloucester, Mass., on Sunday, November 22, when a moving picture wreck became a realty. They were presenting the shipwreck scene for the World Film Corporation's "As Ye Sow" picture, in which Alice Brady, daughter of William A. Brady, is being featured. The incident was witnessed by 5,000 terror stricken persons. Even the cameraman, according to accounts, lost his nerve and stopped grinding the film, when a real "thriller" was facing him. Director Frank Crane had engaged the good ship "Island Home," which was to be steered on the jagged rocks in Brace's Cove. Charles Martin, Cornelius Linnehan, William Sawyer and Salvator Paglasi, all local seafaring men, were engaged as the actors.

As the ship came into the cove, under a full head of sail, a lifeboat trailing a dory, lying in her course, made ready to take the crew off. The picture was intended to merely represent the breaking up of the schooner after she had struck the rocks. The cameraman had made all preparations and the crowd had drawn close to the shore. The dory had been floated alongside the schooner. Paglasi had jumped in and was safely pulled to the lifeboat. The dory had been allowed to float back. As Linnehan attempted to jump into it, a great wave hurled the small boat into the air. The dory, containing the man, was whirled about and crashed against the side of the schooner, causing it to break to pieces, throwing its occupant into the water. After a short struggle he managed to grasp the shattered bow and the rope and was pulled to the lifeboat.

Great excitement prevailed among the crowd on shore, for a moment later, the schooner crashed upon the rocks. Martin and Sawyer were seen to fall to the deck. The sea was rolling and huge waves were thrown over the ship. The same conditions existed that are to be seen on the Gloucester coast after a heavy storm. The schooner's mainmast crashed into the water, narowly missing hitting the two sailors. The waves swept over these men as they were struggling to remain on deck. Then the foremast toppled its crumpled mass of canvas, wrecked spars and rigging overboard and the old ship started to break up.

Everybody believed that death was not far distant for these two men. They realized that quick action was necessary. All attempts of the lifeboat to reach them were frustrated by the big waves and raging surf. Within a short time, the schooner had broken in two. Only a portion of the bow and part of the stern remained. Time and time again the men were almost carried away. As a last resort at what seemed to be a suicidal attempt, Police Officer Harry Bickford, who was in charge of the lifeboat, stripped and with a rope attached to his waist, dived overboard in an attempt to reach the wreck. It was necessary to haul him back.

At last the crowd thought of the lifeboats in the station of the Massachusetts Humane Society. One of these was dragged out and with a volunteer crew, went to the wreck. Both men were removed in an exhausted condition from the remains of the good old "Island Home." They returned to the shore amid wild cheers from the crowd. Martin and Sawyer were suffering from many cuts and bruises. After the rescue, Martin said, "All the money in the world couldn't induce me to pose for another moving picture shipwreck. I have been in a real wreck, but, believe me, it wasn't half as bad as the one which I have just gone through."

The Bijou theater, 2023 West Superior street, Duluth, Minn., has been purchased by John Roise from Charles Collins, who had been manager of the motion picture house for the last two years.

High class motion pictures and vaudeville will constitute the programs. Mr. Roise was formerly a restaurant proprietor.

United Motion Picture Producers

Personnel of the Organization Announced by President Erb —Some Well-Known Brands in the List of Productions Promised.

THE identity of the producing companies composing the United Motion Picture Producers, Inc., has just been made public by Ludwig G. B. Erb, president of the organization. This concern was formed recently for the exclusive purpose of providing single and double-reel comedies and dramas, to market which a contract was closed with the United Film Service (Warner's Features Inc.). Its offices are in the Longacre Building, Broadway and Forty-second street.

Ludwig G. B. Erb.

The producers affiliated with the United Motion Picture Producers, Inc., are Albuquerque Film Mfg. Co., Crystal Film Co., Features Ideal, Gene Gauntier Feature Players, Mittenthal Film Co., Nelson Film Corporation, St. Louis Motion Picture Co., and Smallwood Film Co.

The Gauntier Feature Players, with the talented and popular Gene Gauntier in leading roles, produce two-reel dramas for the new program service. Single-reel comedies and comedy-dramas are contributed by the Albuquerque Film Mfg. Co., which produces "Luna" films. Gilbert P. Hamilton is the director of this company, and Dot Farley, the leading woman. In pursuance to the request of many exhibitors who have subscribed to the United program, the "Luna" company will revive the Frontier Twins series, with Miss Farley in the leading role.

Ethel Grandin supplies thrills for United Film Service audiences in a series of two-reel dramas, which the Smallwood Film Corporation is evolving for the new service. Miss Grandin's interpretations of leads for the screen in the past, make the announcement of her inclusion in the United Film Service's stellar list especially welcome news to exhibitors.

Starlight films, back of which is the name of Mittenthal, who have been making features for Warner's Features, Inc., is another well-known brand represented. This firm enlivens the program offered by the United Film Service with single-reel comedies.

Superba, too, is included among the consolidated program companies. The films appearing with this trade-mark, which are made at the Crystal studios, are in a comedy vein and will be single reelers, with Charles De Forrest in the leads.

The Features Ideal output, highly dramatic in character, and given rank among the photo-plays that bring to notice an especially high level of acting, also are programmed, in the form of one and the two-reel dramas.

One-reel comedies and educational pictures bearing the imprint of the new Nelson Film Corporation, of which J. Arthur Nelson, president of the U. S. Film Corporation, is head, are two further noteworthy series contracted for.

Associated with President Erb are Gilbert P. Hamilton, head of the Albuquerque Film Company and a producer of the highest standing; is the vice-president; Leo Stern, a well-known New York lawyer, is treasurer of the United Motion Picture Producers, Inc. Mr. Stern occupies a similar position with the Gene Gauntier Feature Players.

The secretary is H. M. Goetz, formerly assistant manager of Warner's Features, Inc., having charge of that organization's many exchanges.

The United Film Manufacturing Co., with offices at 1431 Broadway, New York, is the latest to enter the ranks of film producers. The company is backed by prominent theatrical men.

Flamingo Releases

Elaine Sterne's "Without Hope" Leads the List with Other Prize Winners to Follow.

THE Flamingo Film Company, in this issue of the Moving Picture World, announces dates for its first releases, beginning on December 20th with Elaine Sterne's comedy drama in four reels entitled "Without Hope." This comedy was awarded the second prize in the Morning Telegraph-Chartered Theaters Corporation National Scenario Contest which closed September 15 last.

The story of the play is said to be an exceptional one and in Miss Sterne's best style. The dramatic features of the story are built around a conspiracy on the part of spies employed by a foreign government to steal from the inventor his formula for noiseless gunpowder about to be tested by the United States government. The comedy element, after the opening prologue, is introduced through the advent of a little slavey girl, Hope Flannigan, into the action. Hope doesn't know she is mixed up with an international conspiracy, but it is through her innocent activities that the plot is revealed and frustrated. The comedy situations are continuous and, while entirely natural to the action of the play, are unique.

Fred Mace is the producer of "Without Hope" and he surrounded himself with a notable company of players. Miss Marguerite Loveridge, one of the best-known players for the film drama, was especially engaged for the part of Hope. Miss Mary Charleson, of Vitagraph fame, was given the important role of Irene, daughter of the inventor and sweetheart of the playwright, Van Alstyn. Both Miss Loveridge and Miss Charleson will be seen at their best advantage.

The advent of Miss Catherine Proctor, famous as a Belasco star of many seasons in "Paid in Full," "The Easiest Way" and "The Governor's Lady," in each of which she played the leading part, into motion pictures, is made in "Without Hope." Miss Proctor plays the difficult role of LaBelle, the head of the foreign spies to whom is entrusted the work of securing the noiseless powder formula. Miss Proctor's work in pictures is fully up to the standard of her stage work. William Mandeville, Caroline Rankin, David Andrada, Johnny Doyle, Gertrude Barrett and Harry Kendall were entrusted with the other leads for the comedy in which 104 persons appear.

The second release under the Flamingo brand will be Caroline Wells' farce comedy in three reels entitled "Puritan Conscience," produced by Mr. Mace and practically the same company as seen in "Without Hope." The comedy will be released January 10th. Miss Wells was awarded third prize in the Scenario Contest mentioned above.

On January 31st Samuel C. Appleby's unique comedy drama entitled "The Sibyl of the Film" will be released. This comedy was fourth in the contest and it is believed will create a sensation. The producer is Mr. David Miles, of Los Angeles, with a picked cast for its interpretation.

The February release of the Flamingo Company will be Roy McCardell's satirical comedy, "A Jay in Peacock Alley," given first prize in the National Scenario Contest. Under Flamingo brand will shortly be announced a series of single-reel comedies extensive preparations for which are now under way.

All Flamingo comedies will be released through Sawyer, Inc.

ANOTHER GAR EL HAMA PICTURE.

The Great Northern Film Company announces as its current release "The Adventures of Gar El Hama," in four parts. The picture is especially interesting in that its central character is one which figured in two former Great Northern releases about two years ago, at which time the hero attained great popularity. The present production will therefore be welcomed by the exhibitors and fans who remember the other Gar El Hama pictures.

The photoplay tells an interesting, romantic story, which was staged amid unusually picturesque surroundings. It is said to be very thrilling and was produced on an elaborate scale. Some very novel and wonderful lighting and photographic effects are introduced.

The title role was interpreted by the great European dramatic star, A. Hertel, the same actor who appeared as Gar El Hama in the former productions. He has attracted much attention by his excellent characterizations in the pictures mentioned before and also in the recent Great Northern feature, "After Thirty Years," in which he also portrayed the leading part.

Jesse L. Lasky Returns from Coast

While Away, Supervised Extensive Additions to the Lasky Plant and Enjoyed Trip in Mountains.

JUST returned from five weeks in what he described as God's country and man's paradise, Jesse L. Lasky referred with enthusiasm to the picture-making possibilities of Southern California. So, too, he told of the changes taking place at the Lasky studios, of new companies being formed and of the plans of the company to increase its output from the modest twelve a year, with which it began business but a year ago, to thirty-six every twelve-month. Mr. Lasky's trip was taken for the purpose of supervising the general enlargement of the Lasky plant. The company has added to its roll two directors and a host of players. Prominent among these is House Peters, who becomes a permanent member of the Lasky forces. Another well-known screen artist is Blanche Sweet, who is to be starred in a series of Belasco plays.

"We started to build the best equipped glass studio in California," said Mr. Lasky, "so that we might take advantage of the rainy season. The structure is 100x80 feet. There was one regret in that to clear the ground we had to destroy a most beautiful orange grove just bearing fruit. We also put in a plant of machinery for the making of all our properties as well as the more difficult carpentry work on scenery. We also created a new wardrobe department, so that we are now able to put on all of our productions independent of outside agencies. Each division has been placed in a new building, so that the plant is really quite extensive.

Lasky and De Mille Prospecting for Locations.

"We also leased a two-acre lot alongside of the studio for the making of big outdoor scenes that do not need special backgrounds, such as a circus, etc. We acquired a lease of a ranch of about 20,000 acres. Here is to be found some of the finest scenery in California. Mountains rise to a height of 6,000 feet. On the top we can get snow, while at the base there is an abundance of tropical foliage. Included in this property are three or four acres of remarkable desert and cactus. One great advantage in the possession of this ranch is the possibility of making use at some subsequent time of properties in the construction of which we have gone to great expense. In 'The Rose of the Rancho,' for instance, we had to build a whole street. This setting has been available for 'Cameo Kirby.' So, too, when the property is ours we can do as much damage as the interests of the picture may require. We have found the ranch a real asset.

"We have forty head of horses, to which we will add from time to time. Many of these are trained to fall as may be desired by our cowboys. Right here I want to say we have the finest aggregation of ropers and good shots, and incidentally all gentlemen, I have ever met. I went along on a ten-day location hunt to Keene Camps, in the San Jacinto Mountains. We had a company of sixty, forty of whom were rough riders and cowboys, and I had an excellent chance to get acquainted. Some of these men are former Texas Rangers. Their riding is superb; so, too, is their shooting, as we had a chance to see in some of the pictures we made.

"When working on outdoor locations the Lasky players are now always accompanied by a physician regularly employed by the company. The doctor, by the way, has taken such a liking to picture work that he is playing regularly in the mob scenes.

"At present we have four companies. Cecil B. De Mille has just finished 'The Girl of the Golden West"; Oscar Apfel has finished 'Cameo Kirby,' with Dustin Farnum; Frederick Thomson has finished 'The Goose Girl,' with Marguerite Clark, and George Melford has finished 'Young Romance,' with Edith Taliaferro. William C. De Mille is now in full charge of the scenario department. Wilfred Buckland is the artistic director, and supervises all details having to do with scenery, costumes and properties. Cecil De Mille is general director and manager of the plant, assisted by Fred Kley as business manager."

Mr. Lasky on his return stopped off at a number of cities to look after some of his vaudeville interests. He admits that he found theatrical conditions very bad indeed. "It is curious to note," said Mr. Lasky in conclusion, "that in the three branches of the amusement field—the legitimate, vaudeville and the motion picture—the pictures are the least affected by the prevailing conditions. While I saw some good stage productions, all without exception reported business very bad. In Los Angeles the picture colony seems very prosperous; very few are idle. In fact, it was the only place where I got away from the cry of slow business."

The Highest Point Reached, Five Thousand Feet.

JENSEN TO ASSIST FEIST.

Emil C. Jensen, for three years with the Kinemacolor Co. of America, first in New York, and then as branch office manager in Chicago, goes back to the Chicago field, with which he is well acquainted, on Nov. 30, as assistant to Felix Feist, the general manager of the Celebrated Players Film Co.

Jensen is still a very young man, but he is pushing himself forward to advancement after advancement. Recently he has been the senior partner in the Feature Booking Office of Brooklyn, and just before that he was the booking manager of the New York Exchange for Sawyer, Inc., at 1600 Broadway. He is not only a booking expert, but an able publicity man.

RICHARD STANTON IN "A POLITICAL FEUD."

"A Political Feud" is the title of a strong drama presenting in strong contrast a rich and a poor boy that is soon to be released by the Ince companies. It is the simple chronology of the life of an urchin who battles his way to success and a worthy wife in the face of strenuous opposition at the hands of his jealous enemies. Richard Stanton heads the cast and also directed the picture. He is capably supported by Arthur Maude and Gladys Brockwell.

UNIVERSITY OF PITTSBURGH TO SHOW "CAESAR."

At the request of Chancellor McCormick, a date has been set for the showing of George Kleine's "Julius Caesar" at the University of Pittsburgh. The great Roman classic was projected at the Cameraphone Theater, Pittsburgh, for the benefit of the pupils of the Fifth Avenue High School. All Kleine offices report great activities along educational lines with "Julius Caesar."

CHICAGO LETTER

BY JAS. S. McQUADE

Who Is Sue?

A FEW days ago council was held in a secluded room, out on Argyle street, by a scenario editor, two producing directors and the publicity manager of the Essanay Film Manufacturing Co., to decide how best to meet the requirements of a remarkable script that lay before them on the only table in the room. This script was nothing more or less than a scenario that demanded for the leading woman's role "the prettiest and most popular girl in Chicago."

"I don't see how we can turn it down; it has such wonderful photodramatic possibilities," said one of the directors.

"From the nature of the proposition, we would be obliged to go out and find the most beautiful and popular girl in Chicago; and all lady members of photoplay stock companies would naturally be excluded, so as to be absolutely fair," said the publicity manager with impressive emphasis.

"I have a solution to submit," said the photoplay editor. "If we can get the co-operation of the Chicago Herald, I believe we can surmount all difficulties in finding a girl for the occasion."

Immediately it was decided upon that the scenario editor should get in touch with the editorial department of the Herald, and this being done it was deemed wise to invite the department of the "Herald Movies" (the Herald Weekly), to join in the consultation. As a result, a plan was evolved that will keep all Chicago in the throes of expectancy for the next ten weeks.

It was decided to name the unknown popular beauty Sue, and the film subject itself "Who Is Sue?"

Here is the plan briefly: The contest will be confined to an area within a radius of forty miles from the Herald building, on West Washington street. This area will be divided into four sections—the North Side, the Northwest Side, the South Side and the Southwest Side.

To enter a candidate, one must send the photograph of the girl one wants to be "Sue" to the photoplay editor of the Chicago Herald. The name and address must be written plainly on the back, it being strictly understood that no address will be printed. Only the section in which the candidate lives and her name will be printed.

A board of judges has been appointed to judge all photographs submitted in the contest. On the board are: Loredo Taft, Chicago's foremost sculptor; Francis X. Bushman, representing the Essanay Film Manufacturing Company; Allen C. Rankin, photoplay editor of the Herald; Robert R. Levy, representing Chicago exhibitors, and James S. McQuade, representing the moving picture trade press.

Group pictures of the young women entered as candidates will be printed in successive Sunday issues of the Herald and four pictures of candidates will be printed each week in the daily issue of the Herald—one from each district into which the city will be divided.

After all the pictures have been submitted the judges will decide which are the forty "prettiest and most popular girls in Chicago," and then the voting to find "Sue" will commence. The forty selected in the preliminary contest will represent the four districts, ten from each one.

A coupon will be printed daily in the Herald, and anyone participating in the support of a candidate must clip out this coupon, which entitles the holder to five votes, and receive from the ticket seller in his favorite theater the voting power which the coupon calls for.

The voting will not be restricted to the candidate living in the district where the theater attended by a patron is located. One may vote for any one of the 40 candidates.

The patrons of theaters will always have an opportunity of seeing the forty entries in the final dash to the honors, as the "Herald Movies" (Herald Weekly) will show four each week until the contest is completed.

The head camera man of the "Herald Movies" will take the pictures of the forty, and their pictures will be flashed on the screen in all sections of the city.

Prizes valued at $500 will be awarded to the four highest candidates. These four will represent the respective districts. The girl securing the largest number of votes will be given the opportunity to play the part of "Sue" in the Essanay photoplay, and a diamond ring worth $200.

Important Selig Happenings.

William N. Selig has informed me since his return from the West that Sculptor Carlo Romanello has now completed the magnificent entrance to the Selig Zoo, and that he is at present engaged on the drinking fountain. The opening has been postponed until everything is finished and in complete order. January 1, 1915, has been decided upon as the big day.

A Selig western company, composed of Director Colin Campbell, Miss Kathlyn Williams, Wheeler Oakman, Chas. Clary and a strong supporting cast, will leave for the Panama zone very shortly to engage in the production of the "Ne'er Do Well," from the great novel of that name by Rex Beach.

As anyone who has read the book knows, the main incidents are laid in Panama, and so, to get the proper atmosphere in the filmed story, the trip will be made. It is Mr. Selig's intention to visit the canal region during the company's stay there.

"The Rosary," under the direction of Colin Campbell, is about finished, Mr. Selig tells me. "The Carpet of Bagdad," adapted from Harold McGrath's most successful story, has just been received at the Chicago end, and will be ready for release in the near future. This subject is in five reels and has several surpassing oriental scenes.

In the Chicago studio, "A Texas Steer" has been finished, with Tyrone Power in the lead. "The Circular Staircase," based on Mary Roberts-Rinehardt's novel, is now under way at the Edendale studio, under the direction of E. Le Saint.

News from Wharton, Inc.

Theodore W. Wharton, of Wharton, Inc., Ithaca, N. Y., spent several days in the city the past week, on business. He was accompanied by Mrs. Wharton. They left for St. Louis Friday, Nov. 27, whence they departed for New York, on Sunday, Nov. 29.

As has already been announced, the product of Wharton, Inc., is being marketed to Eclectic—35 reels in all since June last, 20 reels having been released up to this date.

Mr. Wharton stated that the first of the new Eclectic series of detective stories, the name of which has not yet been announced, will be released near the close of December. The series is being produced in the Wharton, Inc., studios in Ithaca and New Jersey. The company has leased the Pathe studio No. 2, in Jersey City, for the making of interior scenes, and many of the exteriors will be made in Ithaca.

In addition to the Eclectic series, the Wharton Company will carry on the regular work.

Chicago Film Brevities.

F. E. Samuels, manager for "Cabiria" bookings in Illinois, Wisconsin and Indiana, with offices in Suite 809-11 Schiller Bldg., this city, called to see us last week. He stated that he was well pleased with the bookings made thus far, and that two sets had been booked up for nearly the whole of the winter. He reported a big demand from Wisconsin for this subject. In Chicago "Cabiria" is booked for not less than three days in any theater.

About four or five weeks ago the first reel of "Pilgrim's Progress," a four-reel subject, was left on a South Side elevated train bound for Englewood. The films had been rented by Dewitt Cleland, son of Judge Cleland, of Englewood, for a Sunday school entertainment. As the single reel will be of little use to anyone except the owner of the set, its return to Room 962 Insurance Exchange Bldg., Chicago, will be recompensed by a liberal reward, and no questions asked. The set of films was rented from the Atlas Educational Film Co., in the Mallers Bldg., by Mr. Cleland.

I called on Jack Hardin, manager of the Eclectic Chicago offices, one day last week, and found him up to his ears in work. He informed me that bookings in the city are keeping up steadily and holding their own with competitors. He also stated that the Pauline series is now being booked steadily in out-of-town theaters, and that the owners will run them at one week's interval instead of two. Quite a number of these new bookings have recently been made. The last episode of the Pauline series will be released on Dec. 15. The first of a new Eclectic series of detective stories to follow the Pauline series, will be released in the latter part of December.

Ontario's Law Fire Preventive.

No Fires in Theaters Since Passage of Act—Rigid Examination for Operators.

A REPORT handed out by the Provincial authorities shows that since the passage of the Ontario act over two years ago, there has not been a single fire in any theater in the entire Province. This is a most enviable record and can be entirely attributed to the thorough nature of the laws governing both theater construction and the efficiency of the operators, who are put through one of the most stringent examinations ever composed. Before a theater can be opened it must pass both the municipal and Provincial inspectors and must conform to both by-laws.

Each operator is compelled to serve an apprenticeship and must then pass his examination, during which he must answer over 100 questions dealing with the machine, the lamp, the film and danger possibilities, the averting of fires and all necessary precautions, a knowledge of electricity and all the connected devices. The lanterns must be of substantial construction and equipped with automatic fire shutters. The machines must have two fireproof and airproof magazines, while the operating room must have self-closing doors, and all shutters to openings must be fastened by an inflammable cord, which will burn at the slightest fire. R. C. Newman, the Provincial Inspector who has been partly responsible for this splendid record and who was really the father of the rigid inspection system, is an old theatrical stage worker and electrician who has installed electrical systems in some of the largest theaters in Canada and the United States.

EDNA GOODRICH RETURNS TO APPEAR IN LASKY PICTURE.

Edna Goodrich, the dramatic star, has returned to America from Europe to fulfill her contract to appear in a Lasky production, which engagement was arranged before the opening of hostilities on the continent. After a few days in New York Miss Goodrich will proceed to the Lasky studios at Hollywood, Cal.

DEAL KINDLY WITH THE DIRECTOR.

Edgar Lewis, the moving picture director, offers a plea in behalf of the persecuted director. He says: "Every critic is ready to jump on the director, when in many cases it is not the director who is to blame for the faulty production, but the conditions under which he works. Critics either do not know or do not consider how the director may be hampered by the management. They accuse the director of inability to understand the subject at hand, when more often the director is doing very well with the material at hand. Before denouncing the director for his poor selection of actors or meagre setting, it would be only fair if the reviewers would inquire into the matter further. Often the point is that the management offers the director just so much money and time to do a production. The amount of each is seldom enough to give the director free rein to his imaginative ability. It is not fair to blame the director for those things beyond his control.

PATHE PLAYERS KILLED ON THE FIRING LINE.

The news has come that two of the Pathe Company's strongest players, Rene Alexandre and Paul Capallani, have fallen in battle. France has many sons who in these days have died for their native land, and there will be many more who will "give their last full measure of devotion" before the sweet morning of peace will dawn on that beautiful country, their love for which they have so dearly proved. Some have fallen in the struggle who seemed born for just this fate, for in the days of peace they showed little usefulness; but there are some whom France and the world could ill afford to lose. Rene Alexandre and Paul Capallani were artists; they were mirrors through which France could know herself; they were message-bearers through whom France could make herself known to all the world. They were motion-picture artists, shining followers of the only art that needs no translation; and the whole world has lost them, not France alone.

How terribly Fate allots its black ballots of death in this titanic struggle. Its eyes are blind to strength, wisdom, skill and beauty. It chooses, we know not how, the very best with those of lesser worth. France and England and Germany and Russia will lose and still lose men whom we cannot spare. Others may come to do the work they leave unfinished—but not to this generation. Such men as Alexandre and Capallini will live in our memories, that is true. They will shine in the sunlight when the morning of peace comes; but this generation will find none to do their work.

Doings at Los Angeles

TURKEY DAY was observed here this week with all the pomp and good feeling and with an air of good fellowship among the photoplayers of the colony. Everyone ate turkey, and the day was spent in all kinds of amusement. Some motored to Corona to see the big automobile speeders, while others spent the day at the beaches. The amusement places were visited, and some people just stayed at home and enjoyed the day of giving thanks. Many merry social parties marked the week, the most notable of which was the photoplayers' ball at Venice. J. Barney Sherry, our friend the Irish Prince, and Miss Mabel Normand, our queen of the movies, led the grand march. A following of picture players in full dress was on hand, as were a thousand actors and other movie people in costume and disguise. The night was one of mardi gras, and for the first time in the history of the land Thanksgiving eve was celebrated. The same night, Fred Kley, business manager of the Lasky studio, issued the toasts at the good fellowship dinner at the club. His party adjourned later to the Venice ball and took part in the grand march. One of the best dinners ever was this week's, a large number of members being present.

Inceville is to go on the map officially, for papers have been received which make it a post office. The little village will soon be incorporated, and a small city government organized to handle the business of the town. Much progress is noted here in the way of building and improvement. Mr. Ince is doing much for the picture business up here and the canyon studio is becoming more well known each week. The county is remodeling the coast road, and now autoists can tour way up past the studio without getting stuck in the sand. Many new and big productions are being put on, and others are ready.

R. S. Sturgeon has been gone for several weeks to Bear Valley, waiting for the first snows of the year; and he is now on the way back for Turkey Day and Sunday, to return later and shoot the snow when it falls. The company has been isolated for these weeks and their only amusement has been their own theatricals, dances and outdoor games. They have finished the scenes for summer, and now winter has to fall before the picture can be completed. Nearly all the local Vitaplayers went to the ball at Venice on Thanksgiving eve, many in full dress, and some in costume.

Lee Hill, who was with the Santa Monica Kalem, has joined the Crown City Film Co., in Pasadena, and is playing leads with Dorothy Davenport. The first story is "The Crystal Globe." There are 18,000 acres under the lease of the Ince Company, making it the largest moving picture producing location in the country. The zoo is fast nearing completion and is one of the most efficient in the country. The front is about half done and will be a thing of beauty when finished.

Some people call Los Angeles the "colony." Why colony? Some people here have become so well anchored to California that they could not be pulled away with a ten-ton truck. Thomas H. Ince did a bit of hero work the other day when a mad bulldog invaded the studio. He was on the stage overseeing a western picture when the crazed animal appeared. He grabbed a rifle and shot the canine, but not before it bit another dog and a cat. All three animals were buried together.

Raymond B. West has also gone bugs! Not crazy, just bought an automobile. He invested in a racy roadster of Stutz make, a wonderfully attractive car, which he drives to and from Inceville. The first day he was caught for doing 22 per hour through the Jap village. He will contest the charge, for the little city is not incorporated and the state highway law says you can trim them up to 25 per hour.

W. E. Keefe, who digs up news for the Mutual, uncovered some queer facts, and here they are: Eddie Dillon, comedian, alias driver of his own car, has owned a racing machine over three months, has travelled but 21 miles, using hardly three gallons of gas, and yet the cost per mile exceeds $30. The car is in the shop undergoing repairs for the fifth time, the latest bust-up being the connection of the front end with a rail fence.

Footballists of the University of Southern California and their coach were enabled to study their methods in playing by the courtesy of Thomas H. Alfred L. Simpson Dead.

Original Song Slide Man Passes Away After Long Illness—Was Schoolmate of Colonel Roosevelt.

ALFRED L. SIMPSON, one of the first men to make song slides, died at his home, 113 West 132d street, New York, on the eve of Thanksgiving Day, Thursday, November 26. Bright's disease and an affection of the heart was the cause of death, the deceased having been an acute sufferer from that complaint for the past six years. He is survived by a wife only. Funeral services were held by the Elks Lodge No. 1 on Friday evening at the home of the deceased and burial was made on Saturday at Cypress Hills cemetery, Brooklyn.

Alfred L. Simpson was born in New York on December 5, 1859. His early education was obtained at old School 30 and among his classmates were Colonel Theodore Roosevelt and George Kleine. Being of a musical turn of mind Mr. Simpson was given a thorough training in that art, receiving instruction from such distinguished masters as Carlo Patti and Signor Cattivanni. He gained considerable renown as an orchestra leader and at one time presided over the orchestra of Wallack's theater and other New York houses. For several years Mr. Simpson was musical director for the Great Herman, the magician, also for the first production in this country of Gilbert and Sullivan's comic opera "Pinafore." Later he was musical director for E. E. Rice's big spectacular production "Evangeline," for which he wrote the incidental music.

Mr. Simpson composed many successful songs and instrumental pieces while following the musical profession and became deservedly well known for his contributions to the art.

In 1894 Mr. Simpson joined Joseph B. Maxwell in a vaudeville engagement, singing illustrated songs and the team became known as the "kings of the illustrated song," being very popular with vaudeville patrons.

Mr. Simpson embarked in the business of manufacturing song slides in 1902 and was quite successful. He had taken up photography as an amusement when a boy and became an expert amateur in camera work. He was a charter and a life member of the Camera Club of New York. The advent of the motion picture theater engaged his attention to the extent of inventing and patenting a metallic coated curtain suited to the showing of pictures in daylight. It was known as the Simpson Solar Screen. Since then the idea of coating screens with a metallic substance has become quite general.

The deceased was a member of the Automobile Club of America, Elks Lodge No. 1 of New York, Musical Protective Association, and the American Institute of Arts and Sciences. He was a brother of the late George W. Simpson, U. S. N., who was acting Paymaster General at the time of his death in Washington and had been Chief Disbursing Officer of the Navy for many years.

Mr. Simpson was married in 1898 to Miss Ida L. Willax, of St. Augustine, Fla. Mrs. Simpson will continue the business established by her husband.

ROTHAPFEL GETS LOVING CUP.

At the Strand after the regular program on Sunday evening, Nov. 29, David Belasco, Jesse L. Lasky and a party of friends presented S. L. Rothapfel, manager of the Strand, with a beautiful loving cup in recognition of his services in staging the private showing of "The Rose of the Rancho" at the Belasco theater on Nov. 15. The presentation was made by Mr. Lasky in Mr. Rothapfel's private office. A suitable response was made by Mr. Rothapfel to Mr. Lasky's presentation speech. The cup is of solid silver and is appropriately inscribed.

"In the Days of the Thundering Herd"

A Thrilling Western Photodrama in Five Reels, by Selig—Written by Gilson Willets and Directed by Colin Campbell, with Tom Mix and Bessie Eyton in Leading Roles.

Reviewed by James S. McQuade.

ABOUT twelve months ago Colin Campbell and Tom Mix paid a visit to Chicago and went over the story of "In the Days of the Thundering Herd" with Gilson Willetts, which had been written with the object of giving an accurate glimpse of life as it was lived in the far middle west in the years around '49, when gold was first discovered in California.

I was favored by being present at some of these "talks," and was impressed by the decision arrived at, on the suggestion of Mr. Selig, that strict attention should be paid to historical correctness, both in incidents and detail, in the production. In other words, the Indians of those days and the plainsmen, their manner of living, their camps, their hunting expeditions, their fierce and sanguinary engagements, etc., should be visualized as nearly to the life as possible. To bring back the days of the buffalo chase realistically, it had already been arranged at the time that the 7,000-acre buffalo ranch of Pawnee Bill, at Pawnee, Okla., with the largest herd of buffalo in the world, should be used in the hunting scenes. A large force of native Indians had been secured among the tribes in Oklahoma and a carload of tepees had been manufactured in Chicago, on the order of Mr. Selig, to furnish the pictures a typical Indian village. How well the plans and preparations have succeeded remains for each spectator to judge for himself.

From my viewpoint, after viewing the pictures twice, I can say fearlessly that the five reels teem with action and radiate with atmosphere of the old days with a vividness that can be felt. One is translated from the wonders of modern days to the old Santa Fe trail and the long, winding line of "prairie schooners" headed towards the setting sun. We see them making camp for the night, and watch the stealthy approach of the Indian girl, who soon makes known to her people the presence of the white men.

Then comes the attack by the red devils, who gallop swifty around their victims, discharging their muskets as they circle, until only two of the whites—the hero and the heroine of the story—are left alive. Next follow the thwarted torturing of the man and his escape with the white girl, only to be pursued and recaptured, and their next get-away which is successful. This time they come upon a band of white hunters, and this camp is, in turn, attacked by the same tribe of Indians. A running fight takes place, in which the white men are pocketed in the hills and are saved from annihilation by the timely arrival of another group of white hunters. This battle, which results in the defeat of the redskins and in the death of their chief, is a most exciting spectacle, and may well be termed the last word in a scene of this kind.

The reader naturally concludes that where there are so many hunters there must be an abundance of big game, and he is not disappointed. We watch both the Indians and the white men as they kill the buffalo, the former bringing down the animals with bow and arrow just as skillfully as do the white men with musket or old-time rifle. The big herd is shown many times in the pictures, under varying conditions, and some of these scenes are strangely impressive. It is to be regretted that still pictures of these remarkable scenes, which can never again be taken, were not included among those snapped for the occasion. The scene shown in the accompanying illustration is unworthy, but better than none.

Tom Mix is pre-eminently the "big chief" in the photoplay, and this is no reflection on the admirable work of Wheeler Oakman in the role of Chief Swift Wind. Tom is Tom Mingle, the pony express man, and afterwards the leader of the white men in their fierce fights with the Indians. He is the sweetheart of Sally Madison, for whom he forsakes the pony express business to accompany her on the journey to join her father in the state of the Golden West. The amazing equestrian feats performed by Mr. Mix, as the pony express man, will probably never be repeated again in moving pictures. Seen one hundred years from now, they will cause men to open their eyes in wonder. In the Indian fighting scenes, Tom holds the eye with the same magic spell.

Miss Bessie Eyton is a worthy companion for Tom Mingle in the part of Sally Madison. I never suspected that she was such a dare-devil on horseback. After that terrific fall, when she is swept from the saddle by the low hanging bough of a tree, I surely thought she had suffered broken bones, if not insensibility. But no; she was up again, after a moment of careful feeling, hastily making her way to a tree, in whose branches she sought safety from the stampeded herd of buffalo. Here's to you Miss Eyton, for wonderful horseback riding and just as convincing acting.

Wheeler Oakman so cleverly disguises himself in the part of the Indian, Chief Swift Wind, both in make-up and impersonation, that one often is impressed with the belief that he is a real redskin. The final contest between him and Tom Mix is a most realistic struggle.

The poetic role of Starlight has been sustained most creditably by Red Wing, the full-blooded daughter of the Indian chief. In a very subtle way, almost imperceptibly, she shows that she is in love with Tom Mingle and that her love is hopeless.

It is needless to emphasize, after what has been written, that the production has been worthily made by Colin Campbell. I will just direct attention to the closing scene, in which Tom Mingle, Sally Madison and Starlight are shown as they set out for the land of promise. As we pathetically gaze at it, new vistas rise out of the saffron west, and we rub our eyes to find out whether or not we are dreaming.

A motion picture of the affair was taken by the Edison cameraman, to be used for exhibition purposes at the Regent Theater.

"On the Belgian Battlefield"

A Remarkable Four-Reel War Picture by Edwin F. Weigle, Photographer of the Chicago Daily Tribune.

EDWIN F. WEIGLE, staff photographer of the Chicago Daily Tribune, has returned from the battlefields of Europe with a series of unusual pictures depicting the present war.

The Chicago Daily Tribune obtained the exclusive rights by the Belgian government to take moving pictures in the Belgian war zone. Joseph Medill Patterson, the well-known writer, who acted as special representative and war correspondent for the Tribune, made the contract with the Belgian government. According to this contract, half of the proceeds taken in by these pictures will go to the Belgian Red Cross organization.

Weigle's pictures show us war as it really is. They are taken on the actual firing line, and you marvel at the chilled steel nerve of this man grinding his camera when shells are bursting and soldiers are falling within a few feet of the lens. Every imaginable phase of fighting is vividly illustrated. There are pictures of infantry in action; of the artillery fire; of soldiers falling and comrades pulling them from the trenches; and of Red Cross workers helping the wounded, Belgians and Germans alike, after the battle. Also there are refugees, thousands of them, ever present, hurrying from the advancing Germans, and then miles of ruined cities and villages and shell furrowed roads.

Most of the weapons of warfare are shown. An armored motor car is pictured covering a Belgian retreat. Then there are machine guns drawn by dogs, ammunition wagons, ambulances, priests and nuns helping the wounded, and soldiers digging trenches with their little square shovels in fields of beets and cabbages.

Burning cities, broken and ruined bridges, soldiers and citizens lying dead, side by side, is the fearful picture recorded by the cinematographic camera.

Probably the most dramatic picture is the explosion of a shell, tearing to pieces a house just back of the firing line near Termonde. The soldiers are first seen in a field near the house. Another house is burning, after having been struck by a shell. The ruined roof is plainly visible.

The photography throughout is remarkably good. Some scenes are stereoscopic in brilliant perspective. The length of the film is 4,500 feet, divided up in four reels.

Olga Petrova

MADAME OLGA PETROVA, the Russian-Polish actress, has been engaged by Popular Plays and Players, Inc., to appear before the camera in "The Tigress," a forthcoming Alco release. This photoplay is based upon Ramsay Morris' legitimate play of the same name, which in turn was founded upon his novel.

Madame Petrova is playing in New York in Panthea. This engagement makes her appearance at the Fort Lee studios of the producing concern possible. Madame Petrova has played in many countries. In nearly every department of dramatic art she has shown marked ability. She is a singer, a mimic, a tragedienne, and now a motion picture star. Her mother was a Russian-Polish noblewoman, her father an Englishman. She speaks fluently all of the best-known modern languages, and some that are not usually included in a liberal education. She is very proficient, for instance, in Welsh.

Olga Petrova.

"The Tigress," her managers declare, is a fitting vehicle for Madame Petrova's temperament. The critics have compared her in some of her characterizations to a serpent, in others to a lioness, while other have said she was a tigress. It has been stated, however, that she was able to convey almost any emotional value across the footlights in the legitimate theater.

In "The Tigress" Madame Petrova has many strong scenes to do in the vein in which the general public is accustomed to think of her, so her admirers and friends believe that she will be very successful as a motion picture star.

"The Tigress" is to be a heavy production with a large cast. It follows in this respect the policies inaugurated by Popular Plays and Players, Inc.

HAZEL DAWN RE-ENGAGED BY FAMOUS PLAYERS.

Hazel Dawn, one of the most charming and talented of the younger favorites of the American stage, who made her debut before the motion picture camera in the Famous Players' production of Bronson Howard's play, "One of Our Girls," has been re-engaged by that concern to star in a film version of the famous comedy-drama, "The Love Route."

"The Love Route," by Edward Peple, author of "The Spitfire," and the recent comedy success "A Pair of Sixes," is a romance of the ranch and the railroad, which will provide unequaled and numerous opportunities for the display of Miss Dawn's captivating powers of characterization.

RELIANCE SIGNS UP GEORGE RANDOLPH CHESTER.

George Randolph Chester, undoubtedly the best-known writer in America, has been signed by the Reliance Motion Picture Company to write a fifteen installment serial entitled "Runaway June," which will be ready for release early in January.

Mr. Chester's fame is world-wide on account of his "Get-Rich-Quick Wallingford" series which appeared in the Saturday Evening Post and book form, four million copies of which have been sold to date, and Mr. Chester has already completed sixty-five "Wallingford" stories.

In writing "Runaway June," Mr. Chester has established a precedent, as he has adopted a new scheme in writing stories. Realizing that in order to produce a successful moving picture it is necessary to visualize, Mr. Chester has written his action out first, and then supplanted the word version in his story. Mrs. Lillian Chester collaborates with her husband in all his works, and she is partly responsible for the success of "Cordelia Blossom," "The Ball of Fire" and "The Enemy," which was Mr. Chester's greatest work prior to "Runaway June." Owing to the great popularity of George Randolph Chester, over 2,500 newspapers have been signed to run this story in serial form.

Among the Picture Theaters

CHEROKEE THEATER, LOUISVILLE, KY.
A Suburban Picture House Which Fills the Bill—Receiving Good Patronage Since Opening.

SITUATED almost at the edge of the city of Louisville, Ky., near one of the big parks and in a high-class residence district, which is growing with great rapidity, the Cherokee moving picture theater is attracting much attention from exhibitors in that part of the country where it is characterized as one of the best and best designed to meet present and prospective conditions of any other suburban picture theater in the South.

At the outset the project to build met with considerable opposition from residents of the neighborhood who were uneasy as to the character of the improvement, but they were won around when they learned just what the promoters, the Cherokee Amusement Company, had in mind, and now some of those who voiced the strongest protests have been warmest in expressing their approval. The problem was an interesting one. The residence section, which the theater is to draw tribute from, is long and narrow, with a big area, however, for spreading out. There has been a well-defined increase in building for the last several years at the rate of about 8 per cent., indicating a correspondingly heavier gain in population. The existing homes were of the better class and the residence section was and is drawing many of the best people in the city who are building and buying homes of high cost and class.

It was necessary then to build a theater which in construction and architecture would suit its surroundings and which must therefore be costly. Considering the cost, it was shown to be the wisest thing to do to erect a theater which would satisfy the community for the time being and answer the purposes and fill the demands on it in years to come. The Cherokee Amusement Company, capitalized at $15,000, has, according to members of the company, made an investment of approximately $30,000. Charles W. Krebs is president of the company, which takes its name from Cherokee Park, one of Louisville's biggest playgrounds; F. E. Schietinger is secretary, and Carl Zang is secretary and general manager. In personal charge of the theater is Theodore F. Roehrig.

So the company has put up what is almost an absolutely fireproof and indestructible theater, fronting 50 feet on the Bardstown Road and reaching back 140 feet on Bonnycastle avenue. It is of brick and concrete construction, with the front of modified Spanish mission architecture and the decorations and embellishments held under very sharp restraint. Really the effect is excellent, the lack of ornate embellishment contributing to the good effect of the whole. The face brick used is of a buff color, relieved with trimmings of a darker hue, while there are three terra cotta panels in the front which add a touch of color.

The entrance lobby, 22x10 feet, almost at the level of the street, opens on either side of the ticket window into the main auditorium, through two sets of doors. The auditorium measures 47.5x100 feet and from the lenses of the operating machines to the screen the distance measures 110 feet, 4½ inches. At the entrance the ceiling is 17 feet high and the floor slopes from the first row of seats 3 feet and 4 inches until the bottom of the incline is reached. Here again is a level, in the center of which is the orchestra well and from which at a slight slope, rise the ways to the two exit doors, one on each side of the stage. The stage has a depth of ten feet, less a few inches, and the curtain is six inches from the inside rear wall.

Four pilasters relieve the surfaces of the two side walls and the spaces in between them are divided into panels, with a chair rail about five feet from the floor. Sockets in each of the pilasters have been arranged to accommodate a total of four wall fans, while in the spaces between the panels there are bracket lamps. The whole interior of the auditorium is finished in rough coat plaster, painted in buff, light green and pink, the colors being used in the paneling and separated by narrow gilded mouldings. The ceiling is white and reflects the light from the indirect lighting fixtures, which are of brass in the form of inverted domes of Turkish mosques. A curb surrounds the orchestra well and marks the front of the stage floor. All the woodwork is mahogany. There are five high transom windows, the panes painted green, to be used for ventilating purposes rather than for light and set high up in the walls.

The heating system is hot air, the furnace room being located at the front of the building and the heat rising through two registers on the level space. The distribution of the warm, fresh air, is insured by two large wall ventilators at the front of the auditorium, with powerful electric fans to draw the warm air from the rear of the building, along the floors to the front. Three ventilators of large size communicate with stacks on the roof.

The flooring of the whole building is concrete. Over the basement, furnace room at the rear of the auditorium, the floor is of reinforced concrete; elsewhere it is of monolithic slabs laid directly on the ground, with the usual cinder, gravel and macadam base. Altogether there are only six slabs in the whole floor, a line dividing them all runs down the center. Two slabs compose the first level, two huge slabs the inclines, and two more slabs the level near the stage, with the slopes up to the exits. The floor was designed so as to make it cleanable with ease. Two hose connections have been supplied at the rear of the auditorium, and there are two drains near the stage with the slopes of the floor arranged so that all water will run into them. The seats are attached directly to the floor with expansion bolts, and, incidentally, are seats of high quality. The plan lends itself well to scrubbing or to sweeping.

There are three separate lighting or electric systems, with three meters, one for the exit lights, so connected as to insure that they will burn in almost any circumstances. One system provides lights for the auditorium, with a number of circuits so that the lights can be regulated as desired. The third meter connects with the motor generators which operates the two Powers 6A machines. The operating room, equipped in duplicate, occupies as usual the space directly over the ticket office, while the executive office is set further to the front and there are two toilet rooms, one for women and one for men, at the rear corners of the auditorium.

This operating room, of ample size, is of concrete over steel lath and on steel rafters, with a reel rewinding room apart from the operating room. Steel shutters and steel doors, some of them automatic where needed, further insure safety. Two large ventilators open out of the top of the operating room. The operating room itself opens at one side to the rewinding and switch room, on the other into a storage room.

There are 32 rows of seats in the auditorium, eleven seats to the row in the center with six at each side, except where the pilasters leave room for one less seat. Altogether there are fixed seats for 708. The aisles are 4 feet and 2 inches wide and more than meet the requirements of the Building Inspector. An electric piano has been installed in the orchestra well. The screen is of the plaster type, finished with a coat of plaster paris, hard, smooth and absolutely white. It measures 22x18 feet and has curtains provided at the sides. The house has been using lenses which project 16x12 pictures on the screen, but lenses, which will enlarge this picture, have been provided for. In use the screen and machines give wonderfully sharp and clear pictures. Metal lath form the basis of the screen, which was trued up and finished off by Mr. Roehrig himself.

So much for the theater building. It is one of the commodious theaters in Louisville and will seat all the people necessary until the neighborhood progresses to the point where a semi-continuous program can be given. Everything is substantial. There is little unnecessary embellishment to be kept clean and deteriorate. Everything is in good proportion and line and pleasing to the most discriminating patron. Vases of flowers at each side of the stage add all the decoration necessary. In arrangement and construction the theater reflects the good judgment and thought of the general manager, Mr. Zang, who sat up continuously with the architect and the builder.

The first show was given on the evening of October 29. The Universal and the General services are being used. The residents of the entire district are kept posted on what is in prospect by programs prepared for the whole week and distributed to every house which could possibly send patrons to the theater.

The reception the theater has met with already is such as to indicate that it will have a most successful career. The promoters and managers of the company are practical business men. The plan of the company is to give the patrons the worth of their money, and to give them much the same character of shows they could see in the downtown district of Louisville without spending money for carfare and taking the time necessary to make the long trip. The theater has been built to stay built and the company is conducting a business which it counts on building up to large proportions.

KOFORD & RYAN'S PICTURE THEATERS.

Brigham City Opera House and Alta Theater Doing Good Business With Licensed and Feature Pictures.

MESSRS. KOFORD & RYAN are the owners of two profit-earning picture theaters in Brigham City, Utah. They are the Brigham City Opera House, which has a seating capacity of 550, and the Alta, which can accommodate 1,000 persons. The exercise of good judgment in the selection of pictures and careful management have placed these two moving picture houses in the profit producing class. The Alta shows licensed pictures while the Opera House is devoted to the exploitation of feature pictures made by Lasky, Bosworth, General Film, Famous Players, etc. The admission price for an entertainment composed of licensed pictures is 5 cents as compared with 10, 15 and 20 cents charged for a show made up of features. One road attraction a month is booked at the Alta. The house can easily handle a legitimate show of goodly proportion for it is equipped with a stage 40 by 60 in size with 80 feet to fly loft.

Brigham City Opera House, Brigham City, Utah.

The Opera House is the old original playhouse of Brigham City, and was erected by the Mormon Church about 1862. A few alterations and the structure was brought up-to-date, and from the photograph of the exterior published with this article one could easily conjecture that it was recently erected. The chairs are roomy and comfortable and the ventilation is good. Quite a number of big productions have been shown at the Opera House such as "Quo Vadis," "Antony and Cleopatra," "The Last Days of Pompeii," "Spartacus," "Neptune's Daughter" and many others.

In each of Messrs. Koford & Ryan's houses there is a three-piece orchestra. In the Alta there are two 6a Power's machines, while at the Opera House there are a couple of Power's No. 5. "Both Mr. Koford and I take the Moving Picture World," says Mr. Ryan, "as neither of us will wait until the other has read it before relinquishing it. We swear by it."

LIBERTY THEATER OPENED.

Big New Theater Seats 2,100—Melodious Numbers of Program Emanate from $30,000 Wurlitzer Hope-Jones Orchestra.

MARKING a forward step in the history of photoplay presentation in Seattle, Wash., and the Pacific Coast, the splendid Liberty theater in Seattle observed its opening Tuesday, October 27. There was no opening ceremonies as the opening of so complete a theater with its numerous surprises in the way of advance construction, and one of the finest and largest Unit orchestras in the United States was sufficient ceremony in itself.

The builder of the Liberty, E. L. Blaine, and its lessees and directors, Managers Jensen and Von Herberg, have left nothing undone to make the theater the last word in attractiveness and comfort for their patrons. To sum up the most striking features in a single paragraph, so far as possible they have erected a practically fireproof theater, giving it the latest heating and ventilating system, built a house with an easy incline instead of stairways to the balcony, provided not only rest rooms and smoking rooms, but even writing rooms and telephone rooms, and have spent $30,000 on a Wurlitzer unit orchestra, and have brought an artist, Henry B. Murtagh, from New York City to play it.

In speaking of the exterior design of the Liberty, its architect, H. Ryan, said: The style is modernized colonial, the front being of white terra cotta with a serrate skyline for accentive purposes to make it different from a business block. The Liberty theater is three stories in height, cost $140,000, was five months in building and is of reinforced concrete and steel, and more than complying in the matter of exits with every safety regulation ever devised. Heat ducts are run through the concrete in the main floor, so that the floor will be warm at all times. The heating is concealed by decorative lattices and double coves. The air is warmed or cooled, as desired, and forced through water for purification. The air in the theater is changed every three minutes. The ventilators are fitted with thermostats, and the house is automatically kept at just the right temperature summer and winter.

One imposing feature about the Liberty theater is its lighting display. Beginning with the exterior, there is a mammoth figure of the Statue of Liberty forty feet high and lighted with 1,200 lamps of 24,000 candlepower. In this figure there are colored lights of red, green, flesh, hair, frosted, robe white, shaded white and pure white, or eight colors in all. Alternating currents give the effect of a huge flame in the torch. It is also marked by off and on flashes. The marquise over the entrance is of double glass; the top glass in brown, wired, and the bottom leaded with colored lights worked in. It is illuminated by 286 twenty-five watt and 4 five-hundred-watt lamps. On the roof there are four torches, which, by a combination of electricity and steam, produce a fire effect. There is a light power of 280 watts in each torch. The skyline of the theater is outlined by 144 sixty-watt lights. There are 2,800 tungsten lamps in use in the theater, and care for artistic effect has been taken at every point. The projection booth is on the main floor. It is equipped with two motor-driven Simplex Machines, hot and cold water, and everything that calls for an up-to-date operating room.

The interior furnishings of carpets, draperies and furniture will instantly command attention. The floor of the main entrance, approaching the ticket office, is covered with inlaid mosaic tile with a Grecian key border in a color that harmonizes. The side walls of the lobby have a wainscoting of black and white Alaskan marble extending around the entire length of the main foyer. The floor of this foyer is covered with a rich French rose carpet extending the entire width of the building. The same kind of carpet covers the incline, which approaches the mezzanine floor, on which are the women's rest rooms, men's smoking room, and the writing rooms. These places are all similarly carpeted. The Rose draperies and portieres are on classic lines in colors to harmonize with the floor coverings and walls. The general color tones are gray and blue; the walls are warm grey, the floor rich blue. The women's writing room is one of the main features of the general furnishing, being most complete in every detail. Each room on the mezzanine floor is furnished with writing desks in old ivory, the tops covered with a very attractive chintz in tones of blue and ivory. Each desk is equipped with a small writing lamp with chintz shades. The furniture is upholstered with the same chintz. The rest room is provided with many couches, reclining chairs and dressing tables.

The seating capacity of the Liberty is 2,100, and has the barrel back and leathered upholstered opera chairs. There are eight loges on the main floor, and two rows of loge seats in the balcony. Simplicity of decoration characterizes the entire theater, and big mirrors are to be found in many parts of the theater. The main auditorium is illuminated by means of a deep cove extending around the theater and containing 150 lamps in reflectors. In the center of the ceiling is a large rosette containing a cove with 45 lamps and a huge indirect bowl with a big amber lamp. The proscenium arch is lighted in an ingenious and unique manner. Four powerful searchlight reflectors are skillfully concealed in the rosettes on the balcony front. These light up the beautiful paintings and delicate architectural detail of the arch. On the level with the balcony is a series of four magnificent paintings representing scenes in and about Seattle. During the showing of the pictures only the amber lights in the large center rosette and one of the three lamps in the bowls under the balcony are kept lighted. Once during each performance the entire flood of lights are switched on.

Last but not least is the Wurlitzer Hope-Jones Unit Orchestra which will prove a magnet for thousands of people during the life of the Liberty theater. The instrument combines the grandeur of the cathedral organ with the finest symphony orchestra. It reproduces most of the effects of the great symphony orchestra and it adds a wealth of tone color. The expression shades controlled by hand or foot enable the performer to reduce the power of the various pipes down to a mere whisper, or to increase it with thunderous effect. The smallest pipe is three-fourths of an inch long, and the largest thirty-two feet in length. The main instrument is placed in four special "swell boxes" built behind and above the proscenium arch and contains fifty-six instruments in all. There is also a piano which is operated from the organ keyboard. An electric motor of fifteen horsepower is required to supply wind for all these pipes. More than 250 miles of electric wire have been used in order to give control of the various parts.

STRATFORD THEATER, BUFFALO, N. Y.

THE accompanying picture is that of the Stratford theater, which, according to the Stratford Theater Company, will be built at the northeast corner of Court and Franklin streets, Buffalo, N. Y. It is to be devoted to the exploitation of moving pictures and vaudeville.

The officers are A. E. Whitbeck, general manager; J. T. Eddy, secretary; Robert Huntley, president; William F. Kasting, treasurer. These are all Buffalo men except Mr. Whitbeck, who formerly managed the Orpheum theater, Detroit. It is said the land and building will represent an investment of $500,000. Popular prices will be the rule.

The Stratford theater will be in the remaissance style of architecture and will be very beautiful, both on the exterior and inside. The outside walls will be of buff ornamental brick with light cream terra cotta and stone trimmings. The plans for the Stratford theater were drawn by Smith, Hinchman and Grylls, of Detroit, who are recognized authorities in theatre designing.

The color scheme of the interior will be carried out in turquoise blue, ivory and gold and will be handsome in the extreme. This work, together with all scenery, draperies, etc., will be done by the Lee Lash studios of New York. The theater will have a capacity of approximately 1,725 seats. Following the modern German plan of theater construction, there will be no gallery. The building will comprise only the auditorium and one balcony, several mezzanine boxes and eight stage boxes. The lighting will be what is known as the X-ray of indirect system, the light being very soft and evenly distributed. A prominent feature of the new theater will be the "mushroom" system of ventilation. Washed and filtered air will be diffused under every seat and pumped out by fans in the dome of the building.

The stage of the Stratford will be seventy-six feet wide in the clear and thirty-five feet deep.

The Art of Exhibition.

Rothapfel Discourses Interestingly on the Psychology of the Audience—Ethical Standards Should Never be Lowered—How the Exhibitor May Win and Hold His Audience—Profitable Maxims Gleaned in the Field of Experience.

By W. Stephen Bush.

MR. ROTHAPFEL was plunged in the duties of his position when the appointed time for our weekly interview rolled around. Singers stood waiting, a long line of men and women "wanted to see Mr. Rothapfel but for a moment," all kinds of practical literature was piled up all around him and presently a committee came in to solicit his aid for the European war sufferers. Urbane, undisturbed, quick and decisive, he satisfied all these demands upon him as far as he could and presently we were alone in the roomiest managerial office in New York. The subject was "The Psychology of the Audience" and Rothapfel was, he said, delighted with the discussion, as he put it, of such a subject.

"The audience is," he began, "the exhibitor's daily; yes, I will say hourly care and thought. My audience is with me always. I feel that in many respects the exhibitor must act as the trustee and the plenipotentiary of his audience. Take the selection of pictures for one thing. He must look at the pictures he intends to put on his program with the eyes of his audience, but how can he do it without knowing his audience and knowing it intimately? Hence the necessity for the constant study of the audience. I have often been called upon to view pictures which, in the opinion of the producers, would look well on a Strand program. I can say that I have been careful and conscientious in this work of selection and when I have been compelled to reject pictures I always did so with regret. I know better than any one else just what my audience wants and I am particularly aware of what they do not want. No exhibitor has learned even the rudiments of his profession if he has no strong and definite feelings on this subject.

The Fallacy of "Give the People What They Want."

Having given the usual warning against being disturbed Mr. Rothapfel conjured up that precious communicative mood, which he manifests but rarely and as he lit his cigar and assumed a pensive position in his favorite chair he expressed in his vigorous direct fashion what he thinks of the old adage: "Give the People What They Want."

"Do the people always know what they want?" he asked quizzically. "Indeed they do not. I will go one step further. I will say that the people ought not to be expected to tell the exhibitor just what they want. It is the exhibitor's business to entertain them and find out what they want or better still give them what they are sure to like without trying to poll them on the subject. His observation of the audience must bring him the information he needs for the preparation of a pleasing and suitable program. I know what my audience wants because I have spent hours and hours watching them from a little vantage point in this theater. No one knows where this vantage point is, but it enables me to watch the faces of the men and women and children who compose my audience. I have seen how, during certain pictures, their faces were drawn tensely, how immovable they sat and how at the same time they enjoyed what they saw. Now I want to say that mere rigidity on the part of an audience does not always mean interest or pleasure. It may be temporary horrible fascination from which the audience afterward rises with a feeling of pain or even resentment. In this connection I want to say that no exhibitor can ever be too careful of the feelings of the women and children in his audience. A long time ago, before I came to The Strand I watched an audience composed mainly of women and children during a picture which showed flashes of a serpent. The expressions of horror and loathing on the faces of the audience which sat rigidly and spellbound convinced me that it is a mistake to show anything like reptile life on the screen. It surely is not an entertainment. No such thing will ever be allowed on my screen.

Polling the Audience After the Show.

"To learn just what opinion my audience has of my show I never ask any spectator directly what he or she thinks. In the vast majority of cases the answer is influenced rather by a desire to be polite than by a desire to tell the plain truth. I mingle with my audience in various ways and wait for an opinion that utters itself voluntarily without promptings of any kind. These unsolicited opinions may not always be to the exhibitors' liking, but in many cases they have a great constructive value to the progressive exhibitor. Such opinions often may enlighten him upon facts of which he was theretofore in ignorance. They frequently enable him to rectify his own judgment and avoid mistakes in the future. If, after a whole lot of hard and conscientious work, I like my performance at the last rehearsal I do not try to put myself above my audience and indulge a vain belief that 'it is above their heads,' but I give them credit to have at least as much taste as I have and I have never been disappointed. How often have I passed among an audience and heard them echo the very feelings that were in my own heart when I prepared their entertainment for them. You say that I not merely hold my audiences but that I sway them as an orator sways his auditors, when he unfolds his fullest magnetic powers. I cannot tell you how I do it. You say that the biggest cranks go away in a happy frame of mind after seeing the show here. Well, I know this is a fact. Mr. Winthrop Ames, of the New Theater, has assured me of at least one conspicuous instance of this kind. Again, I cannot tell you just how I do it. This, however, I may claim. I give up the best there is in me. My heart, my soul, my aspirations are all in this work to the last atom.

Do Not Underrate Your Audience.

"The man that underrates his audience will never get anywhere. Run a little ahead of your audience, cater to their best instincts and never go one inch below that level. I do not try to run too far ahead of my audience because that is equally futile. Now, when I am aiming at something very special I am never bothered by the thought that my audience may not appreciate it. If I succeed in bringing my appeal home to just one man I feel myself amply repaid though my special effort may have cost me lots of time and of thought. I will cite but one instance. I have always tried to be correct in even the minutest details. Take a military trumpet call. I want it absolutely right, just the way it would be sounded in real life. Well, this apparent trifle has brought me most gratifying results. It happened that a military officer of high rank was present in the audience. He probably was the only one who fully appreciated my effort to be scrupulously correct. After the performance he sought me out, congratulated me and passed the word along to all his military friends and acquaintances. The result is that I have the exclusive patronage of all the officers on Governor's Island and elsewhere near New York. It is a fine and most desirable patronage. This is but one instance. It is typical, however. Correctness in details always works to the exhibitors' advantage.

"I have been criticised because I allow slap-stick comedy in The Strand. Well, all I can say is that the American public want to be entertained. They want nothing heavy and boresome and just rave over good comedies. If my critics could be with me in my little observation corner and see this vast audience rock itself into convulsions of merriment they would no more omit an occasional rough comedy than I do. I find the same principle applies to music when it comes to pleasing the biggest possible percentage of my audience. It is a great error to believe that classical music in itself is bound to make a hit. Sometimes the veriest trash gets the desired effect if it is rendered in a classy manner. To play a symphonic movement or a nocturne just because it is a symphonic movement or a nocturne is a mistake often made by directors who have no motion picture experience and no motion picture likings.

What Affects the Audience?

"Audiences are very easily affected either for good or evil. The slightest thing will do it. Let me say that I know of no more important factor than the demeanor of the staff of the theater. The way your staff feels and appears, the way the ticket is sold, the light and the decorations—all have an immediate influence on your audience. If you know how, you can put an air of refinement in a barn and if you do not know how, all the elegance and luxury of your appointment will help but little. Hence the necessity of keeping absolute peace and harmony among my staff. The moment I find any strife or dissension in my official family I drop all other work and seek to adjust the difficulties and locate the trouble makers. Without thorough harmony and loyalty on the part of the staff any kind of success in creating an atmosphere is utterly out of the question. Do not come begging as it were to your audience, familiarity breeds contempt. I make my audience come to me. If I cannot give them a performance which will make them come to me why, I have failed in one of the cardinal requirements of a successful exhibitor.

"You may be sure that the conduct of the manager himself has a tremendous effect upon the temper and the attitude of the audience. He is the observed of all observers and the latter includes the staff as well as the general public. How he dresses, how he receives his patrons, how he deports himself is all very important. Managers standing in the lobby with their hats on and a cigar in their mouths or posing in front of the ticket office are doing their employers no good. It must of necessity happen that business is at times slack and that there is a loss of patronage and revenue. Some managers seem to make it a point to advertise their disappointment by pulling long faces before their public and retrenching expenses. Can you wonder that in such cases the house goes down rapidly? Any one can smile in a flood of sunshine, it is the exceptional man who keeps up a courteous and cheerful demeanor toward his patrons when the receipts begin to show a falling off. How often have I seen a mediocre show saved by courtesy and cheerfulness.

"Of course shows cannot always be uniformly of the highest type. Some weeks the show is and always will be weaker than others. I have often in former years had to struggle with poor materials. In such cases I always took my employees into my confidence. I called them together, told them that our show was a bit weak and that complaints might arise. I warned them to be extra polite and to have a constant eye on the comfort of the patrons. This attitude often disarms criticism. The people know the show is poor, but they are put in a mood to make allowances and the anticipated complaints never came.

"People highly appreciate the note of personal attention. We make it a point, even here in New York, to learn the names of steady and distinguished patrons of whom we have many. These patrons are always addressed by name and carefully catered to. Hence that feeling of loyalty among patrons here. Whenever an usher in any way learns the name of a patron he is supposed to report it at the office and in his treatment thereafter we are able to sound the pleasing personal note. In a case of a complaint I am to be notified immediately. I do not ask the patron with a grievance to come to my office, I come to him. In all the existence of The Strand having played to more than two million people since April last we have had but about ten complaints. I get hundreds of letters from patrons every week, some making suggestions, some just criticising. I welcome these letters and answer every one provided it is signed. The audience feels whether the management is painstaking or otherwise. I walked fifteen miles in a blinding snowstorm rather than disappoint my audience in a small Pensylvania country town and thus won the loyalty of every picture friend in the place.

Clean Business Pays.

"I would think myself utterly unfit for the exhibiting profession if the consideration of a little temporary gain would sway my judgment at the expense of ethical standards. The man who is afraid to lose a little money in his pursuit of ideals is not only weak morally but he is a mighty short-sighted business man. When I took over theaters in the past that had catered somewhat to the lower instincts of the audience in foolish anticipation of gain, I immediately restored the ethical standard of the show before I did anything else. Indeed, it made no difference to me where I was and what my employers wanted whenever any ethical question was concerned. In such cases I know no other position but to stand firm for the right. I never failed to succeed in the end. Somehow my appeal always found an echo among the best classes in my community. For a time I might lose money, but I knew it was only for a time. While I was struggling to adhere to my ideals in Minneapolis I received a most unexpected letter from the foremost clergyman in the city, the Reverend James W. Cool, well known all through the Northwest. Let me show you his letter, which I prize very highly. He says: 'A man who will brave the chance of losing money rather than pander to the lower tastes should receive the support of every citizen interested in the welfare of humanity.'"

NEW THEATER FOR TRENTON.

The Hildinger, Bishop and Lamont enterprise, with offices in the Alcazar Building, Factory street, Trenton, N. J., which company controls ten picture theaters throughout Trenton, New Brunswick, Millville and White City, added another picture house to its list when it opened the Princess in Trenton. The new structure is situated at Clinton and Meade streets, and has a seating capacity of 750. Its equipment is so complete that there is nothing left to be desired by the patron. The semi-indirect lighting system is employed.

PICTURE HOUSE CHANGES HANDS.

Charles Christianson and sons, Frank and Allen, of Manistee, Mich., have purchased the Gem and Electric moving picture theaters, which have been under the management of the former owner, Charles Russell. Mr. Russell has been forced to give up his business on account of ill health, and he and his wife will spend the winter in the west.

ALBERT ROCCARDI.

"WORK in pictures will improve the art of the actor," says Albert Roccardi of the Vitagraph Company. "There are actors, for instance, who do not know how to walk across the stage or how to hold their hands," says Mr. Roccardi. "It may seem a simple thing, yet it is just as essential for a player to walk properly as it is for him properly to speak his lines. Again, there is the factor of repose. The camera teaches that, and very early."

Albert Roccardi.

Mr. Roccardi has been at the Vitagraph studio not quite a year, but in that time he has done finished work. He has the faculty of taking what some might consider a minor part and making it stand out, which, after all, is the best test of an actor. He did this in one of the first roles that fell to him at the Flatbush studio, that of the railway guard in "Mr. Barnes of New York." Mr. Roccardi has appeared in "'Fraid Cat," "Buddy's First Call," "Wife Wanted," "Uncle Bill," "The Win(k)some Widow," "The Man Behind the Door" and "The New Stenographer." Mr. Roccardi also appeared at the Vitagraph Theater in the silent stage presentation of the last named comedy.

Mr. Roccardi has been on the stage in the United States for thirty years. Even as a very young man he was successful in a number of important pantomimic productions in Paris. He appeared in "The Devil's Auction" and "Excelsior," and engagements at the Folies Bergere and in vaudeville were followed by an important role in the big Hippodrome production of "Bayard." It was at the Hippodrome that one of the Hanlons, visiting Paris, saw Mr. Roccardi and engaged him for work in America. The young man made a hit both in "Fantasma" and "Superba." After the expiration of his contracts with the Hanlons Mr. Roccardi's transition from the pantomimic to the speaking stage was the natural thing. He appeared under the direction of Charles Frohman, C. B. Dillingham, Cohan & Harris and Liebler & Co., and with such artists as John Drew, Billie Burke and May Irwin. In the season of 1912-13 Mr. Roccardi visited Europe for the first time in twenty-eight years, going to London with one of Klaw & Erlanger's productions, "Officer 666." Aside from a short trial of musical comedy, in which he discovered a marked incompatibility of temper with that form of amusement, this was Mr. Roccardi's last stage work. The comedian likes pictures, and he likes working at the Vitagraph. "One fine thing about that studio," said Mr. Roccardi, "is that all help each other. If a situation is yours every one will help you get it over."

ROCHESTER GETS NEW THEATER.

The Regent Theater, East avenue and Chestnut street, Rochester, N. Y., was recently opened. The interior is beautifully decorated in old rose, old ivory and gold. There is a broad promenade at the rear of the balcony which is meeting with approval. A big Hope-Jones pipe organ dispenses the music.

NEW THEATER FOR SALAMANCA.

The Strand Amusement Company of Salamanca, N. Y., expects to have its new Strand theater in that city in operation by January 1, 1915. The location is at 56 Main street. The new house will seat between 350 and 400 persons. The lobby will be 22½ feet in width by 8 feet in depth. Inside the theater, spectators will pass behind the motion picture screen (which will be at the front of the house) to their seats, which will face the front of the building, the picture booth equipped with two machines being situated at the rear of the building in a fireproof addition. There will be a stage and an orchestra pit in front of the picture screen. The Strand Amusement Company is composed of I. Gutman, L. Kohn, secretary and treasurer, and M. H. Goodman, manager.

OBSERVATIONS

BY OUR MAN ABOUT TOWN.

After a lapse of about a year, the Bureau of Fire Prevention again got after a number of motion picture concerns last week for failure to comply with the regulation requiring such companies to procure permits for the storage of films. Prosecution was entered against thirty-two companies, all being quartered in one building on West 40th street. The renewed activity was undoubtedly due to a recent $30,000 fire in a film company's plant on West 45th street. The storage of films is one of the most perplexing problems that film companies have before them. Although the building in which the prosecuted companies were located was erected as a fireproof structure the authorities claim that it falls short of the fire department regulations covering the storage of films. Since these violations have come before the court, there has been a movement to erect a building that will comply with the requirements of the fire department, the vaults to be paid for by film exchanges and agents by membership fees. The idea is an excellent one. The only question is whether there are a sufficient number of film handlers able to subscribe the amount of money required for the project. All the old companies in this city complied with the law when it went into effect about five years ago, so that the new project really appeals only to companies formed since that time.

It was remarked the other day that people having films in stock should place them in some of the many fireproof storage houses in the city where so many people keep their valuables. But even such buildings fall short of the requirements and insurance rates on films are so very exhorbitant that the owners of the buildings would not accept the storage. It is also stated that the Board of Fire Underwriters threaten to cancel the insurance on all buildings in which films are stored unless the places are fitted up in compliance with the regulations of the Bureau of Fire Prevention, and have permits from the bureau. A number of companies who faced the same proposition about a year ago found the solution both very trying and expensive. Companies that have started out with small capital and limited quarters will find it still more so. There seems to be but two avenues of escape for them, either get in on a co-operative building plan, or store their films outside the city limits.

"How is it by you and the raising of prices?" I asked an exhibitor yesterday. "Oh," said he, "I'm all right and I am not bothering about the prices. The producers are doing all the talking and the more they talk the more complicated the question becomes. I see one producer says that, to solve the question, the manufacturers must raise the standard of their films and the exhibitors must abolish cut-throat competition. There is nothing in that line of argument. In the first place, the standard of motion pictures today is as high as it has ever been in the history of the business. I refer to the products of the leading companies. The fact that the people willingly pay from fifteen cents up to a dollar to see straight picture shows, instead of five and ten cents, proves this. As a rule, the standard is all right. The point is to hold it and better it if possible. In the second place, the exhibitors are not responsible for the cut-throat competition. The producers should talk to the exchanges about that. The renters can cut out that competition by maintaining prices that will keep the films out of the hands of cheap grade exhibitors who make themselves competitors to exhibitors who pay more than they do."

"Now, let me put the matter before you squarely. I am one of the oldest exhibitors in the business and have passed through all stages of the game. One of the best systems the film manufacturers ever had was the one by which rental exchanges were obliged to abide by a schedule of rates and films impaired by use were consigned to the junk heap. The exchanges are doing the throatcutting, and, to do it, they are handing out some films that are so worn out as to be unfit for projection."

"You will admit, however, that some exhibitors are responsible for the competition because they snap up the offerings of cheap producers."

"Sure, but if the standard producers defend their better class of patrons against such exhibitors by requiring the exchanges to maintain standard rental prices the standard exhibitors can snap their fingers at the competition. I know of several companies that can raise their prices now and get them if they can protect those who are willing to pay. If there must be cut rates for houses that cannot get more than five cents, let the rental exchanges fix zones so that such houses shall be outside the competitive distance. Many of the five-cent managers keep people from the ten and fifteen-cent houses by telling them to hold off and they will see the same pictures for five cents. Some ten-cent managers also work the same scheme against higher priced houses."

"What do you think of the proposition to cut down the changes of program to twice, or three times a week?"

"That will be more difficult of operation than the raising of prices. One of the chief agencies in the promotion of motion picture popularity was the response to the public demand for changes of programmes. Higher priced houses running big features would not be affected by such a change. But the cheaper houses in residential districts, with no transient trade to depend upon, would find it difficult to hold the people even if prices were not raised. Motion picture fans in such localities demand variety. They will stand for repetitions only upon request. I do not take the suggestion seriously. To the contrary, I believe that when the industrial conditions take a favorable turn and the film producers have outlined their plans to meet the revival, the production of films will exceed all records. Look the field over and you see new producing companies being formed and studios going up in all parts of the country. One of the most striking evidences is the creation of studios for use by people on rental. Productions from such sources, of course, are subject to discount. The producing end is easy enough. The chief point is to get the market. But all these things will lead to overproduction that is going to hit many in the business quite hard. The next thing to follow, will be a slump, which will be survived by only such companies as have established themselves with the people and those who may reach that goal before the crash comes."

This same view was reflected by a man prominent in the financial district of this city. He said too many people have become "picture mad" so far as producing is concerned and a crash is due. The first people to suffer will be investors, who know nothing about the business and rely solely upon promoters. "There are thousands of picture houses all over the world," said he, "and they change their programmes daily, which requires an enormous output of films—running into the hundreds of million feet a year; but look at the number of producers that have jumped into the market within the past year. The production today exceeds the demand. I fear too many are counting upon an enormous world demand when the war on the other side is settled. They evidently forget that when that time comes, the foreign producers will be on the job again. My opinion is that, in the absence of a monopoly of the market in this country, the best investment offered by the motion picture field is in the building of theaters of the better class. Outlets are wanted. Think of all the legitimate houses that have fallen by the wayside. In spite of all the claims made by managers in the Broadway district, business is worse than bad with most of them. Go to any of the leading picture houses and you find people unable to get seats. The same thing applies to other cities. Take what theatrical correspondents say. I have just been reading some of the letters. One from Syracuse, N. Y., says 'vaudeville thrived and the various motion picture houses.' An Indianapolis writer says 'as the season goes on, there is a marked improvement in the drawing power at motion picture houses.' Many new houses are being opened throughout the country, but I am confident that there is still a field for investors. Up-to-date theaters with all the comforts and accommodations for the better class of people, who, by reason of the lack of such places, have not become regular patrons, offer the real field for investment."

When asked to specify his doubts as to companies supported by outside investments being able to pull through a crash the financier said he would qualify the statement so as to not make it general. "As a rule," said he, "such investors take pains to inquire into the ability and responsibility of the promoters. But when they put their money in they do so with the expectation that a reasonable amount of dividends will be forthcoming. I can name at least a half dozen instances within the past two years where the expectations were not realized and the investors withdrew their support, satisfied to lose what they had already put in, but firmly decided to risk no more. I know of one company that changed hands three times within eighteen months. The promoters were fortunate enough to get a new bunch of investors each time.

Advertising for Exhibitors

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

C-r-e-t-r Again.

ALMOST, but not quite, we are ready to let a certain person get away with the suggestion that our system is to "let George (E. Carpenter) do it." He has had a lot of the limelight lately, but he generates enough current to run the lamp, and while we might fill these two pages each week with our own gems of thought, we are not suffering from enlarged cranium, and we know that lots of people can tell more to the readers than we can, so we coaxed Mr. Carpenter to make another spurt and tell how he does it, feeling that exchanges and exhibitors alike would be interested. Discarding the purely personal paragraphs, including one to the effect that he thinks this sounds a bit too egotistical, we give what he has to say about advertising.

There is lots of fun connected with the publicity end of a representative film exchange in the West. Unless one is of a light-hearted disposition and not prone to worry over your work and generally take life too seriously, it is a good thing to keep out of, however, because it has its little exasperating moments.

A year ago the manufacturers, as a rule, were too all-fired busy plotting against the whites to provide "canned" press dope, but they are improving and now all are falling into line in the direction of furnishing stuff, good, bad and indifferent; still, even now, some of the weirdest copy ever sent through the mails comes from New York and Chicago, and the delusion is that the newspapers will print it.

Faint carbon copies in which the editorial "we" is still painfully in evidence, adjectives raped from the dictionary, predominate; matter is single-spaced, and bald statements are set forth which no self-respecting dramatic editor will print in advance, for the simple reason he may have to retract when the subject is eventually shown on the screen to the palpitating public; and the stuff is anywhere from half to a newspaper column and a half in length!

But all that is an easy matter for a man with newspaper experience to adjust—and that is what one exhibitor in fifty has not. He (the newspaper man) can rewrite it and fix the press matter up in such shape that the average dramatic editor will "hang it on the hook" with a sigh of relief, as he consigns the single-spaced stuff to the wastebasket with the other hand.

It is getting the exhibitor to "plant" the stuff that is the rub.

Strange as it may appear, the average exhibitor—one can't call him a manager—looks upon advertising not as a fixed overhead expense, but as a blatant luxury. When business falls off the first thing he does is to cut down on his advertising. The writer recalls one instance where an exhibitor was induced to spread himself in the newspapers and on the billboards on a certain feature. The cash returns were truly heart-warming, and when Mr. Exhibitor came to check up on Saturday night he was overheard to remark that he had spent too much money for advertising. "I would have had $125 more," he affirmed with red-hot trimmings, "if I hadn't blown myself!"

There is the exhibitor who spends his good money whenever he does "advertise" to knock his competitor's wares. There is the man who declares that everybody knows where his theater is, so what's the use? Others assert that they have "tried it" and "it don't do no good nowhow." One man in a small town solemnly told the writer that he never spent more than a dollar and a half a week to advertise his shows, and one week he cut it out and didn't notice any falling off in his receipts. Then there is the philanthropist who hands the editor an alleged advertisement, "because I believe in helping out the home paper."

We all know the types and turn with joyous acclaim to the Live Wire Manager who is always putting one over, who makes it a point to cultivate the press gang and who in consequence is generally referred to by the opposition down the street as "the luckiest guy in the show business."

The pioneer in the education of the exhibitor in this inter-mountain West is a small package of volatile energy who answers to the name of Louis Marcus, president and general manager of the Notable Feature Film Company, and since he installed a publicity department at least half a dozen exchanges in the country have fallen into line, until it will not be long ere an ex-newspaper man will be a necessary adjunct to every film exchange. (Note. Marcus is Carpenter's boss.—E. W.S.)

The writer was selected as the sacrificial goat in this case, given an office, told to get results, and left alone. (Get the last two words.—E. W. S.)

The first thing on the program was to get into touch with Mr. Exhibitor, and he proved to be a very coy individual. He was not making any too much money and had none to fool away on experimental advertising. The papers were charging too much anyway. He had never advertised, and the fellow in the next town didn't—the old, old arguments of the man who is not brought up in the business.

Then the exchange started the publication of a weekly house organ; not a dry-as-dust catalogue of coming releases, but a little josh, chatty, slangy stuff that started Mr. Exhibitor writing into head office. Then a prize was offered for the best newspaper ad. on a current subject during a specified week. Later a mimeograph was purchased and all hands were bombarded with circular letters; press dope was prepared on every subject and release handled by the exchange, and generally the bearings of that trusty old Edison were kept red hot. Exhibitors were informed that if they were too busy to prepare their own ads there was a man at head office who would do it for nothing, etc., etc. The exchange did not care a hang whether Mr. Exhibitor did business with it or not, come on in, the water's fine, we'll be a good fellow and help you out anyhow.

Today there are a number of managers in the five inter-mountain states who take half and quarter pages in the newspapers, and if the shipping clerk omits to send out press dope ten days in advance the subsequent howl is heard from Dan even unto Beersheba.

Several show shops employ press agents and get results according to the salaries they pay, and the newspapers are getting interested.

Each production is billed, like a show, ten days in advance. A line of paper from one to 24-sheets, press dope, cuts, photos, slides, copy for ads, etc., is shipped ahead and all the manager has to do it to select an item, whether it be four or forty lines in length, fill in the name of his theater and the date and hand it into his newspaper. And it gets printed!

Of course, this is all old in the show game, but to the uninitiated motion picture exhibitors it was a new thing.

The newspapers are now sending critics to the shows, and in some towns where certain photoplays are not shown the newspapers are arising to ask the reason why.

Harking back to the mimeograph: One exhibitor in a certain town, several in fact, stated that his public could not appreciate good stuff and he proposed to get by with a cheap program. A telephone directory of the town in question was secured and for $15 the town was circularized. The sequel was that the inhabitants thereof arose in their majesty and demanded better shows, especially one particular brand of photoplay production, and generally made life a blank and blithering waste for Mr. Exhibitor—all of which goes to show it pays to advertise.

Too many exhibitors seem to think that they are doing an act of charity when they give the paper an advertisement. If it is the right sort of a paper and the right sort of a house, it is far from charity; it is an investment.

A Novel Setting.

F. D. Stanton, of the Orpheum theater, Gardner, Mass., sends a photograph of his stage setting. The set, as can be seen, is merely autumn leaves on branches surrounding the screen, and the cost was limited to the expense of an express wagon. Under subdued lights, Mr. Stanton writes, the effect is rich. It will give ideas to others.

In the old days we used to get terribly tired of seeing the same old sets week after week in some of the vaudeville theaters and rejoiced in others where the settings were renewed. We noted, too, that the regulars were as quick to notice new settings as we were and the display of a new setting at Keith's or the Williams houses was always the signal for a little ripple of applause. In the darkened photoplay theater there is less need of change, but the regulars come two or three times a week, perhaps, and tire more quickly. Anything for a change will help. If you cannot get an entirely new set you can at least give the suggestion of novelty. Where a wall screen is used without a stage, there is more leeway, but even here a rearrangement of draperies or plants where they are used will help the effect.

Mr. Stanton wants to know if we would be interested in a good scheme for distributing heralds, posters and D. K.'s. Certainly we would—and several thousand exhibitors as well. He says he'll send it if we ask.

Gold Dollars.

Ralph Ruffner sends in a postcard picture of the gold dollar marks used at the American Theater, Butte, Mont., on Million Dollar Mystery days with this comment:

> Herewith small photo of the lobby of the American theater, showing the now famous gold dollar marks which are used on the "MILLION DOLLAR MYSTERY DAYS."
> These cutouts are 28 inches high with gold bronze on each side. They are suspended from the lights around the "marquee" by a small piece of string and, as they sway to and fro in the breeze, they attract considerable attention, especially so on bright days when the sun causes them to flash like a mirror.
> They do not cause the lobby to look stuffy, but rather add to its decorative effect. Furthermore, the ceiling of the marquee back as far as the doors contains 244 mirrors, and when one stands in the center or at one of the box office windows the reflection of the dollar marks in so many mirrors is very striking.
> Another American idea is to display the latest war photographs, furnished regularly by one of the news associations, on boards made to fit over the box office windows. These boards are put up in the morning and left there until opening time at 1:15 P. M. It is surprising to see the crowds standing around the lobby, either looking at the pictures or discussing them. Two large photo boards—one on each side of the box office—on easels accommodate the photos of the big things we are showing that day. It always proves true that when once a person stops to look at war photos, he or she also sees the things we really want them to. It makes talk and serves to call peoples attention to the lobby of the American. Maybe it creates some business; who knows?

The photograph is rather poor, the operator not trying to cut into the lobby. A small flash cartridge back of the box office would have helped a lot. The $ serves as a ready sign for those who are interested in the serial. They would be better if cut out of sheet brass and highly polished each time before being used. It is a known fact that anything that moves is better than a still advertisement, and these catch the breeze and so serve the purpose. This series and the Trey o' Hearts seem to lend themselves particularly well to decorative work in lobbies and elsewhere.

You Can't Stop Sargents.

We don't know whether Len F. Sargent is a relative or not, but he acts like one. He runs the Electric theater, Wausau, Wis., and he contracted for the Trey o' Hearts. The local paper refused to run the story on the grounds that it might offend the other exhibitors, so he is getting out his own four-page weekly and running the serial himself—along with a lot of advertising matter. Just as a trial trip he ran a first issue to prepare for the second, using general plate matter. Now the papers are willing and even anxious to publish the story, finding that the public is interested, but the advertising cuts the cost of three thousand copies, delivered, to $8 an issue and that is too good to be given up. It should be good enough to be continued after this particular serial stops. It is the cheapest possible advertising at that price.

On Posters.

George Editor Carpenter, in Real Reels, gets off this piece in his paper:

> A valued correspondend assigns as a reason for canceling his service contract that the film exchange with whom he is now dealing provides mounted paper on each subject free. Continuing, he says: "As well charge for use of chairs extra in a theater as charge for paper each time. I predict it will not be long till all will be in line with free mounted paper."
> It would appear that the quality of the subjects supplied does not enter into the argument.
> As previously set forth, the Notable Feature Film Company does not handle second-hand paper. Every bit of paper sent out to our customers is new and fresh, for old shopworn paper in a lobby bespeaks old shopworn films on the screen inside.
> No self-respecting film exchange handling high-grade subjects will ever supply its customers with frowsy posters.

Now we know that the photoplay theater must be run with a due and proper regard for the pennies as well as the more important coins, but this man seems to be changing service just because he can get paper free, not because he can get a better service. If it was a better service he would not get the paper free. It seems to be a question of a small tail wagging a large dog. How much is the paper to count against the service? That and not the question of free paper is the vital issue.

There used to be a comedy juggler by the name of O. K. Sato. Some of you may remember him. He would not book with a certain manager (some of you may know him) because the manager used to have acts cheap on Friday when they despaired of getting any other work. Sato sent in a three-sheet, valued at 18 cents. The manager, fearing the juggler, thought he was hooked, wrote and asked what to do with the paper. Back came the answer, "Book me and use the three-sheet up."

That's about the way with some managers. They look at the pennies saved rather than the broader proposition of relative importance of expense, saving and return. If you save a paper bill of even five dollars a week, and get a service that draws ten dollars less, do you really save? There is something more to the question than a saving on paper. If you spend five dollars and make six, you make a dollar. If you save five and lose six, you lose a dollar instead of saving the five. Look at it in that light. That's business. We own title to three typewriters. We could do the work on one at a pinch. But having three machines we can do the work easier. The work being easier, we do more work. More work means more money, and presently we have more than paid the cost of the extra machines and what might seem to be a foolish investment brings a big return.

Not Sterling.

This is not Ford Sterling, but Frank B. Payne, operator of the Crescent theater, Adrian, Mich. He does ad advertising stunts in his spare time and the manager suggested a black-face make up, but he thought he could do better and it is evident that he could. The only advertisement was a sign on the back of the coat, "Today at the Crescent." These special advertisements always attract attention and they are not as difficult as they may seem. We would like to hear from Mr. Payne on some of his other schemes.

Two Tone.

From Auckland, Australasia, comes the house program of the King's theater, of which Fred Foley is the manager. It is unique in that the paper is cream on one side and light green on the other, both being printed in purple. The paper can be purchased here, but it is a little expensive. It is good for a special announcement or a souvenir program. They keep up to date on program at the King's. Most of the subjects listed are still dated stuff here.

Going to It.

Lately we said that Eugene A. Upstill made a good start with a program, but we hoped to see more type on it. Before it came out comes the second number—and the more type. It is awkwardly phrased here and there, but it is better to trip over a couple of sentences than to clip rot and Mr. Upstill talks as he speaks and probably the way others in Long Pine, Neb., talk, and we imagine he gets them right from the start. Mr. Upstill is not a literary genius, but he is doing better by his program than many who profess to be writers. Perhaps he'll let you have a copy. It is a good model if you want the best you can get for little money, but make your printer give you the same result. Don't let him doll it up. It's all right the way it is.

Word of Warning Note.

If George Editor Carpenter doesn't look out he'll get his supposed usher out of character. The youngster is beginning to think too grown up.

Bad Dope.

An exhibitor sends in a "contract" offered him by an advertising company whereby, in return for free advertising novelties, he is bound to distribute only the novelties supplied by the company. The contract runs for five years.

Any man who signs such an absurd document deserves all the trouble he gets into. Under the contract he can be required by law to distribute any advertising sent and to present to his patrons the most objectionable sort of stuff. He can be required, if asked, to distribute stuff every day, no matter what the stuff may be, and he cannot accept any other form of advertising, or even put out his own stuff. No one is going to give you free stuff just because they love you. Don't do it. One company was recently closed up by the Post Office. You may not be so fortunate as to have your task master closed up.

INQUIRIES.

Questions concerning photoplay writing addressed to this department will be replied to by mail if a fully addressed and stamped envelope accompanies the letter, which should be addressed to this department. Questions should be stated clearly and should be typewritten or written with pen and ink. Under no circumstances will full manuscripts or synopses be criticized, whether or not a fee is sent therefor.

Plotting.

EVEN so. You have seen that head before and you are going to see it again and again just so long as the plot remains the great essential. If you know it all, pass on to the next article, but it won't hurt you to read this, even if you do know all there is to learn.

But first learn what a plot is. It is not merely "something about somebody or something," as one student put it. It is something interesting about somebody. Moreover, it is something that has a definite start and a definite ending. It must be complete in itself or else it is not a plot at all, but merely a section of a history. Of every hundred stories sent out by proud authors it is safe to say that half contain no plot. They are either histories or merely rambling incidents. Another quarter of the scripts have plots, but old ones. Perhaps twenty have interesting plots that for reasons of morality, policy or expense, cannot be produced. This leaves only five scripts out of every hundred with real plots. This is the reason that the percentage of acceptances is so small and also is the reason why so many promising writers are snapped up as staff by the companies.

And yet, given proper training, the formation of the plot is a thing so simple that its shaping-up becomes instinctive. Ninety-nine times out of a hundred the trained writer will think only in complete plot, so it follows that the first task of the novice is to learn precisely what a plot is and then, having that knowledge, to learn to think plots and not incidents.

Do not, for example, think of the girl who comes to the city, gets a job on the stage and becomes a famous actress. That is history; that is incident, but it is not plot. On the other hand, if you think of the country girl who comes to the city to go on the stage and make enough money to pay off the mortgage on the old home, you have a definite object to work to and the accomplishment of that object brings the happy ending and a failure the reverse. But while you have now a plot, you have one so old that few, if any, will consider it. But at least you have a plot, a start and finish for your story. It merely remains to embelish it. Every marble statue was once a rough block. Given the workman it becomes a squared stone to go into some building. Given an artist it becomes a thing of beauty and a delight to the generations. It was not the marble that made the Venus of Milo, it was the sculptor. That particular marble might have become the doorsill of the mansion of some patrician and his door sill might have become the Venus. The crude basic plot is much like the freshly quarried stone. On its transformation depends its value.

We have, then, the basic plot of the girl on the stage. Eight times out of ten she becomes the amateur who is so very bad that she is funny enough to command a large salary. The other two times she usually becomes a famous star. Now and then an expert workman takes the theme and builds something fresh. Here is an idea for instance: The girl comes to the city. She procures employment. Jethro, back in the home town, knowing the situation, slaves to accumulate the mortgage money, fearing that she will not succeed. By dint of privation and industry he accomplishes the sum, purchases the mortgage, cancels it and goes to town to seek the girl to tell her that her object is accomplished and that she can come home—as his wife if she will. The climax is capable of infinite variation. He may arrive just in time to save her from suicide. He may arrive too late. He may find her too infatuated with the gay night life of the restaurants to care either about progress or the delights of a home. He may come just in time to save her from the tempter whose offered price is the money she has vainly sought to earn. Given one hundred writers, at least ninety-eight would use one of the first two developments. Two might strive for something new. The obvious idea will not sell. The new development is apt to.

It is not enough that you think the idea is new. It must be new to the editors, and they are more familiar with the produced ideas than you are. No matter how new it may seem to you, if it is not new to him you will not sell. You will see on the screen many old ideas; ideas worn threadbare. It does not follow that these ideas were sold to the company. One of two things happened. Either some director wrote his own script to the best of his limited literary ability or the story was purchased because of some novel twist that the director may have left out because he did not understand it. This may seem to be impossible, but we know of more than one script that has had all of the originality removed by an incompetent director, and has become as threadbare as the rest.

Do not take refuge in the fact that so much you see on the screen is hackneyed and stale. You have nothing to do with that. Your part is to offer the studios the originality that is lacking. If more of you could do that, there would be fewer poor scripts on the screen.

But unless you have a real plot it is useless to offer a script anywhere, no matter how good the business written in may sound. The plot is the first requirement. If you have a really good plot you cannot very well help writing a good story. It will almost write itself. Study plotting and find success and do not even try to sell until you are certain that you have mastered plots.

The Mirror Contest.

The Dramatic Mirror is now in line with a contest that should appeal to the prize chasers. It offers $50 for the best ending for a Mark Swan comedy, the contestant to supply the last three hundred feet of the story. There are several consolation prizes. For details see any issue of the Mirror.

Eclair Wants.

We delayed inserting the Eclair request for scripts for the statements that the company has located in Arizona and was "limited to water scenes" seemed to be in contradiction. Bert Ennis writes that it is even as we thought. The company is located at Tucson, Arizona, and cannot do scenes calling for large bodies of water.

The company stands in need of one-reel comedies and one and two-reel dramas to be played in the Western environment. It does not want costume stuff. The scripts should NOT be sent to the studio, but addressed to the Scenario Editor, Eclair Films Co., Inc., 126 West 46th street, New York City.

Thomas, Too.

A. W. Thomas, of the Photoplay Magazine, has a school scheme, and is sending out a booklet with some most alluring statements, such as a list of editors who started out as common or garden photoplaywrights (what has been can be done again, of course), including A. Van Buren Powell "who began by turning out manuscripts while working in a garage." Mr. Thomas overlooks the fact that Van was working in his father's garage to help out and that he had already sold many successful scripts to the Vitagraph, Lubin and others. There are a couple of cute little line cuts of a photoplay writer riding around in an automobile and a checked cap, and such interesting statements as "No need of years of preparation," "Scenario writers are widely advertised," "Very few are disqualified as scenario timber," "You may succeed in a few weeks, or it may take you a few months," "If he thinks you ought to continue a month longer than you had planned on, he will tell you and will insist on your continuing." Mr. Thomas has a right to his opinions, but our own opinion is that the promises are too sweeping. Years of preparation are needed as a ground for those who succeed, and more than "very few" are disqualified as writers of any sort.

The New York Inquest.

It would seem that many readers of this department living in New York do not realize what a help the Inquests could be to them and how simply is membership achieved. The club meets the first and third Monday of each month, first at the Savoy theater, 112 West 34th street, and then at Keene's Chop House, where the pictures seen are talked over and other matters of technique are discussed. The only obligation incurred is to pay for what you order to eat, but this does not in any manner indicate that you are expected to order a course dinner. Come to any meeting, make yourself known to the Coroner, and keep on coming as long as your interest holds. They are not formal meetings, but informal chats, and you are at liberty to ask any question relating to technique that you wish. Try it once.

Used to It.

A possibly envious correspondent writes that there is something fishy in the fact that Roy McCardell took both the first prize in the Telegraph contest and the prize in the Horsley name contest. Not if you know Roy. There is nothing piscatorial about the prizes. Ever since we've known him, which is about eighteen years, he has been winning prizes for ideas in office contests, locals and national affairs. It's a habit he has. He sells everything he thinks of and supplies many national advertisers with ideas.

Got a Contest?

Contest stories are the rage now. There is a demand for something new. Once the mere fact of a series sufficed, then came the voting contest in the Ladies' World for the hero of "One Wonderful Night." "The Million Dollar Mystery" offered a prize for the best solution and then the Ladies' World chipped in again with the missing paragraph contest now being run by them in conjunction with Essanay, not to mention another voting contest. But that doesn't exhaust the list. Perhaps there may be something else that can be worked, and you may be able to think it out. It should be kept in mind that the postoffice may -probably will—object to a coupon scheme, to one that requires attendance at the theater as one of the essentials, or anything whereby some valuable consideration is demanded. "The Million Dollar Mystery" is not a lottery since you do not have to see the play, but can read the story in the newspapers. Some magazines might buy the idea and pass it along, or a manufacturer may buy it and arrange for publication.

But don't be in a hurry to send in. Be sure the scheme is both new and entirely practicable.

Too Much Detail.

More than one office system has been ruined by excess of detail, in which the bookkeeping costs more than the factory cost cuts amount to. Some writers work in the same way. They pay so much attention to the little things that the great escape them. To-day an inquirer wanted to know if the one and two-letter words were counted as words in the 250 synopsis. We told her she could cheat to the extent of three a's and a couple of thes, but we would much rather have been asked something more important. It is not the exact 250 synopsis that counts. It is the brief, but fully explanatory synopsis that sells the story and when you work too hard to count the articles, you are apt to overlook the running story. The better way is not to have to count the number of words because you can tell the story properly in less.

It's well to know all the little things, but it is vastly better to know how to write a good scene and to write one than to write a ragged scene because you are worried as to whether you should write "fade to" or "fade down." Your story, the vital, gripping plot is what sells your stuff when it sells. Technique helps a lot, so much so that it should be mastered, but if you give too much attention to technique you are apt to overlook or at least neglect the plot. Do not, for instance try to have just forty scenes because you have read that forty is the proper number to a reel. If you run thirty or fifty and tell the story, it is much better. Do not worry too much about the number of leaders. Do not count them, just don't use too many and you will not need to count. It may be necessary at the start, but learn to work so surely that it no longer becomes necessary, and then you can give your whole thought to the plot and its development.

Economy.

Economy means the avoidance of useless expense, but it does not mean saving money that should be spent.

If you send scripts in long hand to save the expense of typewriting and they are not read, do you save the dollar the typist might charge you, or do you lose the postage both ways and the possible opportunity as well?

If you buy sleazy paper because it is cheap and because it costs less to mail out, and the editor throws out the script because it is mean to handle, do you save on the cost of the paper and on the stamps?

If you use the pages of an old day book that father had when he kept the store, or that Uncle Jim gave you when he changed to loose leaf ledgers, do you save the cost of the paper you might have to buy?

If you use up shop-worn envelopes that break open in the mail and you get your script back from the Dead Letter Office in such a shape that it must be recopied, do you save the thirty or thirty-five cents that two packs of decent envelopes would cost?

If you understamp the envelope in the hope they will take it up at the other end, and the script comes back "refused" have you saved two cents?

If you use one ribbon in the machine so long that the writing is illegible, do you save five or six cents?

True economy is something yet again.

Dangerous Ground.

One of the real writers asks about a story he has in mind. It is a splendid plot, a vital theme particularly at the moment and would probably stick out of the raft of war stuff like a flagstaff in a deluge, but he questions the advisability of sending it out and we had to agree with him that it would be better not to try and sell it, though it would easily bring a hundred dollars from some studio.

He looks at something more than a sale. He knows the story is a big one, but he also realizes that it will probably arouse a storm of discussion and denunciation. It deals with factors that make for strife, and while there is no question as to his chance of selling it to some editor who will look only at the story, without seeing the aftermath, he does not want merely to sell. He wants to keep his name clear of entanglements, so he has decided not to write the plot out.

It takes both nerve and common sense to do a thing like that. It is not always easy to see a three-figure check fade out, particularly when the story, as such, is above the average, but against the hundred in the bank will lie the reputation of being an unsafe writer, and he will be avoided as the man who got the Blank Company into trouble with State and Federal authorities—for that's how big the story is.

Perhaps you may not have so big an idea, but you may try to sell stuff that will rouse antagonism, and if you do you'll get yourself disliked. The motion picture screen is no place for the airing of sectional or sectarian prejudice, no matter how good the story may be. This does not mean that you cannot write propaganda stuff of a certain sort, but that it must not be written in such a way as to make enemies.

Do not merely aim to make a name, aim to keep it.

Definite.

This morning one of the papers had a cartoon. At first glance it showed an artist working from a lay figure in a show window, and it merely suggested an impecunious painter saving the cost of a model. There was only a smile in the idea. But a closer inspection showed that the box the artist was leaning against was that of a ladies' tailor, and at once the humor grew and the look of delight on the draftsman's face was explained. He was a designer stealing another man's model of a dress.

Most of the humor was in the drawing itself, but it served to point the fact that the more you know about a situation the more humor you can see in it. There is a whole story in it in fact, first showing the designer unable to think up an idea for a new gown. He goes out on the street for inspiration. He attempts to follow a fashionable woman, sketching her "creation." She thinks he is a cheap masher and has a policeman drive him away. Perhaps he tries to break into the window of her home, climbs a tree to look in—and falls out; the possibilities are there. Then, at last, on his way back to the shop, discouraged and disgusted, he comes across a duplicate of the very dress in a show window. All through his troubles the dress was there all the time.

A man merely sketching the dress in the window would not be funny. But knowing the rest of the story, the humor becomes apparent. That is the reason why, in comedy, it is better to keep the audience posted on the facts rather than to hold back for the surprise finish.

And here is another point, you had to read the legend of the tailor on the box to get the idea. A man with a band box beside him sketching a window full of hats would have been more quickly explanatory. It would have been understandable to one who does not read English.

Like a Ribbon.

Don't tell any one you have "composed" a scenario. That is as bad as tying it with a blue ribbon after you've rolled it up. You compose music, but you write scripts. Three composers in two days leads to this suggestion.

Changing Around.

Sometimes an author gets the wrong idea from the advice to make a new story from an old one by changing it around. Changing means a complete change, not merely a shift. If in a story a man loses his right leg, it does not mean a new story if he loses his left one instead. Changing a story means so complete a rearrangement of the original elements, together with the omission of some and the addition of others, that even the original author would not recognize his work.

If you saw, for instance, the old story of the woman who burned her wedding dress to warn a locomotive engineer and save a train from being wrecked, it is not a new story if a tramp burns his shirt, instead; but if from the story you get the idea of stopping a train, work to a point where your hero gets a can of oil out of the section house and greases the tracks on the up-grade, then you have changed the story around, providing you also change the reason for the wreck and the reason for the stoppage, and the climax.

Good News.

Two writers this week report that their market seems to be opening up a little. It is only a question of time when the market does get good again.

Bill's Got It.

William Henry Kitchell, of Newark, the place that used to have a ball team, has the right idea. In a personal letter he gives the whole secret of a good play in a single paragraph. This is it:

> Saw a bully feature yesterday. Tom Wise in "The Gent from Mississippi." It's one of the few I'd like seeing again, and the first multiple that I came in at the middle and stayed to see it all over again. Nobody murdered anybody, or did anything worse than to try to get away with a land steal, yet it made something that even two Dagoes who sat next to me enjoyed, although they couldn't read English. It had plain human nature and likable personality behind it, and what I liked most was that you thought the uppety sister was going to get the hero instead of the likeable sister. There was no mush and about all the love you saw was when the two found out a way of double-crossing the villain and they got so excited that he kissed her by accident, and then you knew it was going to end all right, which it did.

Getting Your Friends in.

Lately a script was written about a pair of twins, the authoress explaining that she knew such a lovely pair of twins and was just sure that they would make a splendid success in photoplay work. Up to date she has not sold the script, and is not likely to, because no director is going to be foolish enough to take a couple of untrained girls and give them the leads in a two-reel play, and if he was that foolish there would always be someone else to stop him from making an exhibition of himself.

If you want to run a booking office for a pair of twins or a two-headed calf, go ahead, but if you want to write a story about the personal peculiarities of some personal friend, don't get mad if all the directors refuse to consider it. Most of them like their jobs.

If you want to sell scripts, write the sort of scripts that sell.

Manufacturers' Notice.

IT is an established rule of this department that no apparatus or other goods will be endorsed or recommended editorially until the excellence of such articles have been demonstrated to the editor.

Important Notice.

Owing to the mass of matter awaiting publication it is impossible to reply through the department in less than two or three weeks. In order to give prompt service, those sending four cents, stamps (less than actual cost), will receive carbon copy of the department reply, by mail, without delay. Special replies by mail on matters which cannot be replied to in the department one dollar.

The first seventy-four questions are now ready, and printed in neat booklet form. They may be obtained by remitting 25 cents, money or stamps, to the editor. Every live, progressive operator should get a copy. You may be surprised at the number of questions you cannot answer without a lot of study. Canadians should send P. O. M. O., or coin only.

Question No. 62.

Best answer will be published, and the names of others sending in replies of excellence will appear in the Roll of Honor. Theater managers looking for high class men will do well to watch the Roll of Honor.

Suppose a fuse blows. You install another, and it also blows. Tell us, in detail, exactly how you would then proceed. Suppose a fuse blows after being installed a short time and the performance is kept up each new fuse lasting, say, fifteen minutes. The fuse is not overloaded, and you find the circuit to be free from any fault. What would you then look for? What is the best kind of fuse for projection circuits, fuses inside the operating room, I mean, and what are they best? What should be done with used Edison cartridge and plug fuses?

What is meant by "boosting a fuse" and what ought to be done to the operator who boosts his fuses with copper wire or anything else? Show, by diagram, how you would arrange so as to instantly cut in a new set of fuses at fuse block on your projection circuit. Show us, by diagram, how one would arrange to rectify the polarity if it were suddenly changed at the power house.

Roll of Honor.

Question No. 56 was answered with approximate correctness by the following, who are therefore entitled to the Roll of Honor: A. C. Stewart, Wautsburg, Washington; Jos. H. M. Smith, Fort Worth, Texas; L. C. La Grow, Albany, New York; John Solar, Watertown, New York; L. S. Usher, Winnipeg, Canada; J. I. Roberts, Nashville, Tennessee; M. W. Larmour, Waco, Texas; H. W. Seward, Reading, Pennsylvania; Montreal, Canada, and G. D. Bullock, Hobart, Indiana.

It must not be understood that because a man's name is on the Roll of Honor that he necessarily has made an absolutely correct reply in all respects. In fact there are very few replies of that kind very few indeed. The name being on the Roll of Honor simply means that the man has replied with sufficient correctness to show that he has a comprehensive knowledge of the subject, and a very good understanding of it, though he may be at fault in some of the smaller details in which he will be set right, however, when the correct answer is published. I mention this fact because Brother Roberts of Nashville began his reply to Question 56 by saying: "I see that you have my name on the Roll of Honor on Question 50. It is true that I got it right with the exception of number of circular mills and I would not have known I was getting cheated. I would have figured it out but I could not find out how many circular mills were in a No. 30 wire. So you see I did not get all the question right, therefore you should not have put my name on the Roll of Honor, for that is giving credit where it is not due, and I do not like to be credited with something that is not coming to me; again, if I had not read the answer published, I would have wandered through my existence none the wiser and may have been pig-headed enough to boast about it and have been called down."

Of course, strictly speaking, Brother Roberts is right, and it is to his credit that he entered this protest. However, his answer was sufficiently correct to show that he understood the subject very well indeed, and when a man can demonstrate that proposition to me he goes on the Roll of Honor regardless of minor errors contained in his reply. With this explanation we will proceed to the consideration of the reply selected for publication.

I have selected the reply of A. C. Stewart this time for the same reason I selected it two or three other times, viz.: that Brother Stewart goes right to the root of the matter and places it in very understandable form by the use of comparatively few words, therefore his reply is, I think, more readily understood than some of those who are just as correct, but, through no fault of their own, use up a considerably larger amount of language in setting forth their ideas. It is not the fault of a man that he has not the faculty of stating things concisely; he cannot be justly blamed for that, and it has nothing to do with his knowledge.

Answer to Question No. 56.

By A. C. Stewart, Wautsburg, Washington.

The Question:

What purpose does insulation accomplish? Tell us exactly what insulation really does. "Confines the current to the wires" is not sufficient. Explain why the current needs confining, and exactly what takes place if it were not confined. It is the fundamental idea I am after. Suppose the negative side of a circuit carrying 10,000 volts (or any other voltage, for that matter) to be thoroughly and completely insulated, could you stand on the wet ground and pick up the positive wire with your bare hands without danger? Explain your answer.

The Answer:

When a difference of potential is maintained between two wires of a circuit, the current in each wires is always on the lookout for a chance to reach the other wire and thus complete the circuit. The purpose of insulation is to prevent this, and to keep the wires from coming into electrical contact with some object which might be a conductor and furnish a path through which the current could reach the other wire, also it is for the purpose of preventing a wire from coming into direct electrical contact with a wire of the same dynamo of opposite polarity. In short it is to protect each individual wire from outside interference.

If both sides of a circuit were completely and absolutely insulated from the earth, you could stand on wet ground and handle either wire, one at a time with perfect safety. The reason for this is that a live wire has no affinity for the earth, or anything else except the opposite polarity of its own dynamo. In actual practice this ideal condition is unknown on high tension lines, and it would be almost sure death to attempt to prove the theory on a high tension circuit.

[All of which you will observe is perfectly correct. The editor would, however, add to this by saying that complete insulation is a thing we seldom ever find and except on circuits of very low potential. The Edison three-wire system comes the nearest to being thoroughly insulated by reason of the fact that one of its wires is grounded. It sounds rather strange to say that a circuit is thoroughly insulated because it is grounded, but, as a matter of fact, if you will stop to consider, while one of the wires is grounded the other must of necessity be pretty thoroughly insulated, because the instant the other side gets grounded there is trouble, and so long as one side of the system is thoroughly insulated the whole business is in effect thoroughly insulated, because while one side is connected directly to the earth, there is no connection between the two sides of the system.—Ed.]

Publishing the Questions and Answers.

Gorden V. Humphrey, New York City, says:

> Your invitation to express an opinion as to whether you should or should not publish the questions and answers now being run in the projection department in book form has determined me to write. I believe that to publish the questions and answers would be a very good thing indeed, but even good things can be abused by the unscrupulous. This, however, should not deter you from helping the conscientious fellows along. It is really a question of honesty of intention which the operator must decide for himself. Man is a free agent. He has the gift of reasoning, and this he can use for good or evil. He cannot be forced to be on the square, even with himself. It is up to the individual, and although the editor has his own obligations to write and publish good stuff, and to help others along, he cannot take upon himself the responsibility of his perfectly good work being abused. If a man used the stereotyped answers to pass an examination, repeating them like a parrot, don't you think the examiner would almost instantly detect it, and if the subject matter of the question were altered by him the learn-it-by-heart chap would very soon find his ship on the rocks. I believe, Friend Richardson, that it is a case of your being between the devil and the deep sea, but as you are a good swimmer, that is to say, editor, I would take to the sea. If you publish the answers they may be misused, yes, but on the other hand you would add materially to the good work already accomplished by your Handbook and the department. There are many men who are using standard text books to help them obtain their electrical engineer's degree. Many of these works are merely a catechism of electricity, but their authors did not suppress them because some fellow might use the stereotyped answers to pass an examination. Another point which occurs to me is that the majority of orders for the questions and answers will come from men who are already licensed operators, and who wish to improve their knowledge in the art of projection. One more word: it certainly is refreshing for one who comes from the West to learn that "it is not altogether a question of money" with a New York editor. New York people, as a rule, I am sorry to say, think a tremendous lot of the Almighty Dollar. In closing, please accept my best thanks for the good work you are and have been doing.

I have printed this letter mainly because it talks good hard sense, and comes from a man who evidently has a broad view of things. As to the questions and answers, I have come to a conclusion in that matter and, while for certain reasons I do not care to say how they will be used, the best of them will be used, and in a way which, I think, will be acceptable to all of you. Yes, my brother, it is a fact that here in New York City there seems to be but one God, and that is, as you intimate, the Almighty Dollar. In the West it is bad enough, but here in New York the average man literally worships the Golden Calf. I, myself, am from the West, and five years in Gotham have not made me forget that fact.

He's Not a "Boob."

Levi Na Vaire, operator Orpheum theater, Flint, Michigan, writes:

> Well, here is a money order for $2.50 from a boob operator for which same please send me one of your Handbooks. An operator who came here from Ohio told me they were the real thing, so I decided to have one. Projection here is fairly good, but would be better if we had d. c. We have no local, but most of us chum together and help one another, though there are a couple of exceptions, who imagine they are so far advanced in knowledge that they do not need any one's help, though neither has been as long at the game as I have, and I find I still have things to learn. Our operating room is 12 feet long, 7 feet 10 inches deep, with a 6 foot, 4 inch ceiling; the observation ports are 12 x 9. We have two Powers motor driven machines, taking current through a Preddy controller. My manager gets anything that is needed without a word of complaint, but I make my own repairs. The ventilation of the room is most excellent. We have both a voltmeter and ammeter in the operating room.

Friend Na Vaire is not a boob. The real boob is the self-satisfied fool who does not care to learn. The very fact that the brother is willing to pay $2.50 for a book of instruction merely because some one told him he ought to have it, is evidence that he is progressive. Evidently, too, his manager is a reasonable man, and that is good; but I would suggest to Flint managers that, from any and every point of view, it would be a mighty good proposition to put in current rectifiers and do things right. The projection of pictures with a. c. is just a little bit out of date, and it is getting more out of date every day. I am not criticising the Flint managers, mind you, but simply calling their attention to the fact that they are in error in continuing to use alternating current, when they can now, at a reasonable outlay, secure any one of half a dozen most excellent current rectifying devices which will take alternating current from the line and put it into the arc as d. c.

Huh! Told You So.

Thomas H. Williams, Buxton, Iowa, writes as follows:

> You say, in your comment on the letter from Mr. Gernod, page 331, October 17th issue, that you would like to know where he got his idea that light rays had propelling power. I believe he acquired that idea, wrong though it is, as you say, from a very delicate heat engine, of great simplicity, known as the "Radiometer," which is used to illustrate a class of phenomena discovered by Dr. Crookes. Its action is rather difficult to explain in an understandable way. The instrument consists of a very slight aluminum spider, supporting at the end of each of its four arms a very thin mica plate, each plate being blackened on one side and silvered on the other. The spider is provided at its center with a jewel which rests upon a delicate needle point supported at the center of a glass globe. It, the spider, is retained on its pivot by a small glass tube extending downward from the top of the globe. The globe is first exhausted of air and then sealed. When the instrument is placed in the sunlight, or near a gas or lamp flame, the vanes revolve rapidly, and Mr. Gernod has been led to think that light "makes the wheels go round," though such is not really the case. In proof of this latter assertion an alum cell interposed between the radiometer and the source of light and heat allows the light to pass, but intercepts the heat rays, whereupon the whole ceases to revolve. On the other hand, an iodine cell, which is opaque to light, allows the heat rays to pass through and does not affect the revolving of the vanes when placed between the source of light and heat of the wheel. The wheel is then in the dark but it goes right on spinning. As to getting any useful work out of such a wheel, why, that is something else again, as Old Abe would say.

All of which enables the editor to swell out his chest and to repeat the above heading. I told you so. But he is not going to say any more than that, because the thing really has nothing to do with projection, and we do not want to take up a lot of space discussing a subject of this kind, to the exclusion of matter of real value to operators.

Ralph Durfae, manager of the Millerton Opera House, Millerton, N. Y., also wrote an interesting letter on the same subject, but I feel that we have already consumed sufficient space. Later: A college professor, Cornell University, also wrote referring us to certain text books for data on this matter.

Nothing Like Trying.

Will J. Fallon, Sioux City, Iowa, orders the question booklet and says:

> Am going to try to answer some of those questions. I might not succeed, but there is nothing like trying, anyway. The way I figure it is: If you wish to get ahead in this world, you have got to get down and dig, and that's the reason I want the questions to direct my digging. I have been operating five years, to which might be added the two years I spent working hard to learn. However, the longer a man works the more he learns; or, at least, I know I do. At last we have a local here—No. 355, I. A. T. S. E. Everything is fine so far, and from the outlook it will continue so, at least for some time to come. I think we have the finest bunch of fellows ever gotten together. They are like brothers; everyone pulls the same way.

Well, Brother Fallon, your letter is something more than interesting. You are perfectly right. In order to succeed as an operator you have got to get down and study, just the same as a civil engineer, as an attorney-at-law, or even as a brick-layer has to, and he who does not dig will remain one of the crowd, until he finally drops into an unknown and unremembered grave at the end of a lifetime spent in hard work and cursing his "luck." I am not a believer in "luck." If I want to raise a good bed of radishes in my back yard I don't stand on the back porch, throw a lot of seeds out into the ground and depend on luck. Not on your tin-type. First I fertilize that ground, if it needs it, then I spade it carefully and deeply, mash up all the clods and get it into first-class shape. Then I carefully plant the seeds, and finally hoe the ground several times. As a result of all this I'm likely to have some mighty fine radishes. Now just turn that around and apply the same thing to operating, or anything else. If you want good things you have got to work for them, or, at least I have always had to do it, and I don't know of anyone who has not, except possibly a few who were born to wealth, and its not an uncommon thing for even those fortunate (?) ones to wind up in the ditch. Yes, my brother, to get to the top in operating, as in anything else, you have got to get down and dig, and dig good and hard, too. Sometimes you may become discouraged because the excellence of your work does not seem to be properly appreciated, but if you are the right kind of man you won't get discouraged, but will keep plugging right along, and you may take it from me that the circumstances will indeed be exceptional if the results of your labor will not bring finally forth fruit in the shape of better working conditions and more long-green in the pay envelope.

My compliments to Local 355. That is the kind of bunch I like to hear of. If all pull the same way, and if the term "brother" really means something to you, then you will accomplish things, and in the accomplishment you will derive very real pleasure. There are altogether too many unions where the "brother" has a string tied to it, and "Brother" Jones has a hammer up his sleeve which he bounces on "Brother" Smith's dome every chance he gets, and "Brother" Smith, the dear boy, has a tomahawk concealed in his hip pocket for "Brother" Jones, and both of them have a brick handy for "Brother" Brown. Its a wonder how some of them can look each other in the face, and use the term "brother." In a recent labor convention I heard one delegate, in speaking on the floor of the convention say, referring to another delegate: "As far as Brother [redacted] is concerned, he is no better than a d — scab." Rather amusing isn't it? Queer idea of a "brother," is it not?

Fine Dope.

George A. Grath, Los Angeles, California, sends for the question booklet, and says:

> Have had one of the Handbooks for more than a year, and, say, it's certainly fine dope. I note, in the department, of which I am a regular reader, that operators all over the country are kicking on salaries. Well, you ought to give Los Angeles the once-over. Here is a case in point. The operator's salary is ten dollars a week. He gets the show of six reels, and starts at 10 a. m. sharp. Runs one machine until 11, when a helper comes. He then runs every other reel until 10:45 p. m. His only time to eat is while the other fellow is grindin; out a reel. He can then rush out, grab a sandwich and sprint back. The show closes at 10:45, whereupon he then changes three three-sheet posters, three six-sheets, and six one-sheets; lugs the reels back to the exchange, and does all this seven days a week. This is not a pipe dream, but a fact. Sherman said: "War is Hell." Probably he was right, but he might have made the same remark with equal truth had he worked for just one week at the job in question. In this theater they have two Edison Model B machines which are run down so badly that you can hear them clatter clear out in the alley. The operator has installed a three wing inside shutter, with one large blade and two very small ones. There is travel ghost at both top and bottom, and a blue ghost in center. What would you advise me to get for the study of motors? What would cause my lamp terminals, which are Bell Howell, to burn off in about thirty-five hours, using 40 amperes a c through an Edison transformer? Have a No 6 B. & S. gauge stranded wire, and have no top or back on my lamp house so that it is thoroughly ventilated.

I have given Brother Grath's description of the condition at the theaters in question, which is located on South Spring street, in order to show that not all the unreasonable managers have been forced out of the business. Well, there is one consolation, a manager of this kind could not possibly get an operator, "Jimmie, the Usher," would be all he could expect to secure at the price, so the only real regret lies in the fact that he is probably perpetrating an outrage on the business itself, by projecting miserably poor pictures.

As to the study of motors, I can heartily recommend "The Electric Motor," by Elmer E. Burns, which you can secure by forwarding me a money order for $1.50, together with a stamped envelope with which to transmit the same to the publisher. I cannot give you the address, because that is properly a province of the advertising department, and I don't want to get myself in bad with our distinguished advertising manager.

As to the lug burning off, why, if you are really only using 40 amperes at the arc, there must be something wrong with your carbon arms. I should say they are developing very high resistance, which raises their temperature to a point high enough to injure the copper of the lug. It is also possible that you have an old style lamp, in which the lug comes up pretty close to the arc when the carbons are burnt down short, and therefore get very hot. I would suggest that you take a piece of heavy brass, or heavy steel wire, and make an extension so as to remove the lug farther from the arc, and take it out of direct contact with the carbon arm. However, if the carbon arm is developing resistance sufficiently high to raise its heat to a point where the lug is injured, then that carbon arm ought to be thrown away forthwith.

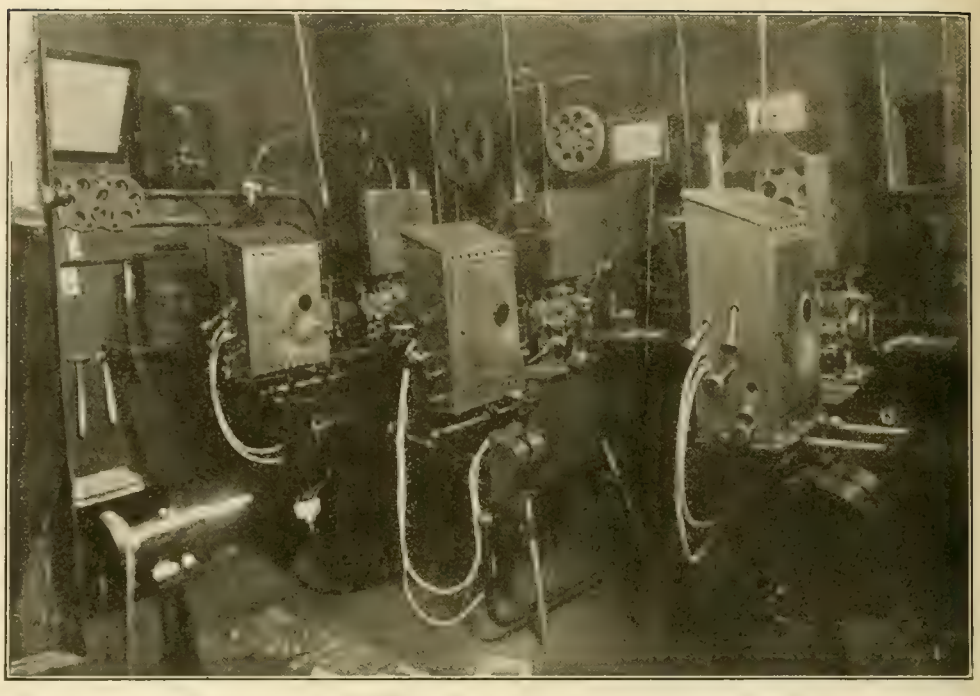
A Real Operating Room.

I am printing herewith two views of the operating room of the Monarch theater, Euclid avenue and East 105th street, Cleveland, Ohio, which was designed by Howard W. Codding, now Executive Chairman of the Cleveland Local Union. Mr. Codding is seen seated on his tool box by the washstand. The guilty looking party by the re-wind bench is the apprentice, George Haskins.

The room has a floor space 10 x 15 feet, with a 10-foot ceiling at the side walls, running to 12 feet in the center, where there is a 36 x 40-inch vent in which is an 18-inch exhaust fan. In the rear wall, a portion of which is seen in the second illustration, are two windows, each 30 x 40 inches, sheet metal being substituted for glass, in order to make the window fireproof with relation to the building next door. In the center of each of these windows, which open on a 10-foot court, is a 16-inch fan, therefore, you see the ventilation of the room is ample. The 16-foot 8-inch mirror screen is located 110 feet from the half size 5¼ focus (presumably e.f.—Ed.) Gundlach lens. A single home-made stereo is used for running the Good Afternoon and Good Night slides, the only ones used. Each machine is connected to two rheostats connected in multiple, one being an 80-ampere Lenord & Bundy, and the other a 40-ampere Power's grid. This is, of course, far in excess of the 55 to 60 amperes ordinarily used for projection. The Monarch is said to have the lightest auditorium in Cleveland, there being sixty 60-watt mazda lamps (inverted lighting system) burning while the picture is on the screen. Mr. Codding is using ¾ Bio carbons on top and ½ on the bottom, being lucky enough to obtain two thousand before they became scarce. Near the top at the right of the second illustration you will note a small mirror screen, which is so located that all the arcs are shown on it. The ammeter is connected into the positive before it reaches the fuse board, thereby giving the combined reading of all the lamps in operation. The voltmeter is connected at the same point. The third machine was installed to eliminate any possibility of breakdown from any cause, but up to the present time there have been none, the only machine parts purchased since the house opened, February 1, 1913, being a pair of tension springs. The machines are used alternately, so that one machine rests every third day, and on that day can be looked over and put into perfect condition. At the other end of the room, not shown in the pictures, is located the emergency system required by Ohio law, the same composed of five 2-volt cells connected in series, which may be used to light the small low voltage lamps around the theater, there also being a pair of them in the operating room. These batteries may be re-charged at any time by reversing a double throw switch which connects a bank of lamps consisting of four 32-c.p. and two 16-c.p. carbon lamps in series with the cells, thus giving a charging resistance allowing approximately 5 amperes to flow. This emergency system is controlled from the operating room. There is also a separate emergency connected directly to the house feeders ahead of the house switch-board, the same being on separate fuses and controlled both from the operating room and the box office. In the picture the wall fire shutters are not in place in front of the center machine. These shutters must be of sheet steel, ¼-inch thick, and at the time the photograph was taken they had been removed to be replaced by others of proper thickness, the first ones installed being only ⅛-inch. This pair of ports are only 6 x 6 inches; all the others are 8 x 12 inches. The walls of the room are tile and brick, 18 inches thick, while the ceiling is of steel roofing with an air gap under it of 3 inches, then metal lath and plaster. The side walls are also plastered. The floor is of cement covered with battleship linoleum, ¼-inch thick. The floor of the room is only 3 feet 6 inches above the main floor of the theater, and it is built up directly on the solid earth. The projection ports are only 6 feet 8 inches from the main floor, which places the lenses of the machines in almost perfect line with the center point of the screen; in fact, the rays of light travel up-hill approximately 8 inches.



Operating Room of Monarch Theater, Cleveland, Ohio.

Another View of Monarch Operating Room.

The theater ventilation is provided for by twelve 16-inch G. E. wall fans, and a blower system which forces 20,000 cubic feet of air per minute (hot or cold) through the room. The fan is a 65-inch blower belt connected to a 5½-h.p. motor, the fan speed being 450 r.p.m. The fan is controlled from the operating room, as are also all the theater lights, with the exception of the extreme front of the lobby and the canopy.

The washstand in Fig. 2 speaks for itself. Hot and cold water should be in every operating room. The first cabinet in Fig. 2 contains the controls for the heating system; the second the switches for the theater lights, and the third the fuse board. The projectors are equipped with double-throw switches, so that there are two sets of No 6 wires running to each machine, each set connected to separate fuses. In case a fuse blows, by reversing the switch a new set of fuses are cut in and thus delay is avoided. In the picture, the fuses in the master cord controlling the port shutter are 18 inches above the magazines; this has been changed so that the fuse links now come under the magazines on brackets. The house is fed by the Edison three-wire system, 120-240 volts d.c. The theater seats 1,000; all seats 10 cents. There is a four-piece orchestra. General Film service, five to fifteen days old; five reels, changed every day. Daily matinees 2.15, and evening show 6.30 to 10.30. Playing to capacity continuously.

This is a real operating room. It is ample in size, has splendid ventilation, and almost everything seems to have been taken care of in the very best shape. I would suggest, however, that instead of fuse links in the shutter master cord, a piece of film would be more to the purpose. The observation ports are ample, which is good. Personally, I like the sliding port described in the Handbook much better, but a port 8 x 12 inches, if properly located as to height, cannot be criticized very much. One thing, however, I must remark upon, and that is the using of 50 to 60 amperes of d.c., on a 16-foot mirror screen. It seems to me that this is excessive, and, as I have often said before, after passing the 45 mark, due to the excessive size of the crater, any added illumination is secured at very high expense. I have never seen a picture projected on a 16-foot mirror screen with more than 40 amperes of current, and it seems to me that anything more than that would be hard on the eyes. However, this is not to be taken in the light of a criticism. The operating room is so very excellent, and its location is so carefully taken care of, that I am inclined to accept the heavy amperage proposition on Mr. Codding's say-so, even against my own judgment. As to the carbon matter, I am getting some very good reports on the National carbon. The record of one pair of tension springs in almost two years certainly speaks well for the machines.

New Ventilation Plan.

A good system of artificial ventilation is becoming more and more a necessity to the moving picture theater. Also it is one of the best advertisements a theater can have. It is a distinct shock to the senses when a patron steps into an ill-ventilated, stuffy theater, and the patron is not anxious to repeat the experience. On the other hand, it is a pleasure to enter an auditorium in which the air is fresh, clean and cool, and this pleasure is reflected in box office receipts.

The Westinghouse Electric & Manufacturing Company have recently placed a new type of ventilating fan on the market. This fan differs from the older style, in that it has a large number of blades, mounted on a wide central disk, and these blades have their ends abruptly turned up. The manufacturer claims that this design was adopted after careful study and experiments, by reason of the fact that it is both quiet in operation and highly efficient. The fan throws the air straight forward at high velocity, instead of spreading it out, and none of the projected air can flow back through the center of the fan, as is often the case with the older design. The unit is very compact, and the motor projects into the room but little. The motor is of special design and built for this particular service. Being entirely encased, it is protected from dust, dirt and moisture. It is claimed to have a high overload capacity, and sufficiently powerful to drive the fan at normal speed, even against a strong back pressure created by heavy wind. In this motor particular attention has been paid to simplicity and thorough reliableness, since motors of this kind are ordinarily mounted in places which are difficult of access. It is designed to run for long periods of time without attention, and requires no more than an occasional inspection and lubrication. The manufacturer claims a high efficiency for the unit, meaning by this that it moves large volumes of air with minimum voltage consumption.

The company also put out what is known as the Westinghouse Sirocco blower, especially suitable for operating room ventilation, shown in the second illustration.

The editor has not examined these devices, but the Westinghouse product is, as you all know, made by a thoroughly reliable, high-class corporation, which guarantee its products, and, therefore, presumably these outfits are all they are claimed to be.

The Size of Spot.

J. B. Day, Sherman, Texas, says:

> I take pleasure in setting forth my experience with regard to size of the spot. In the first place, I never did believe in a small spot, and in 1910 began to experiment with different kinds and different focal length condensers. As a result of these experiments I satisfied myself that by using the right focal length condensers and the proper amount of current I could always have a clear field and a bright picture with a two-inch spot, and from that day to this I have never used one of less diameter. The reason I never reported upon this was because I did not feel like getting into an argument with you, for that was about the time you began to roast operators for not studying, and I told you then there were no books, or anything else, at that time, which they could study with any particular benefit, except the little Handbook you, yourself, put out in 1910, and, believe me, I have still got that little book. To get back to our subject. In 1910 I think about ninety per cent. of the operators were using a small spot. I have been in operating rooms where the operator actually kept his spot so small that the light at all four corners of the picture was discolored, and, moreover, it remained that way from one show to the next. It was then that I began to give the size of the spot size very close attention, with result as above set forth. But before the large spot is attempted one must secure the best grade of condensers, and let me tell you that the best is always the cheapest, and he who experiments and learns how to accomplish results with a large spot will never return to the small one, because he will have a bright picture, and it is no trouble to keep it that way. Of course, there are those who will tell you there is nothing to be gained by using a large spot, but I have been using the two-incher since 1910, and find it gives high-class results and a clear field all the time. Both the Jewel and Gem theaters, of which I am chief operator, will welcome an inspector and an inspection at any time, and you don't need to tell us when he is coming in either.

Brother Day also forwards a blank which ought to be adopted by every theater in the country. It is headed Operator's Report, Gem Theater, Sherman, Texas, and contains space for the following data:

Date .....191..

Name of subject	No.
.....	.....
.....	.....
General Condition
Leaders and Titles
Does film need renovating
Patches
Sprocket holes
Oil and dirt
Received from Operator

As to a large spot, as I said in former articles, I am thoroughly convinced it is the right thing. Of course it requires more current, but not as much more as you might think. However, even so, money expended for current under these conditions is money mighty well spent, and the light you get will be the best light there is, since, as I before pointed out, chromatic aberration will be almost entirely eliminated.

A Complete File.

F. R. Culbert, Athol, Massachusetts, writes:

> I have a complete file of the projection department from October 8, 1910, to date, and I would not lose them for anything. Have been using a rectifier for more than two years, and have not had the slightest trouble with it, except that it is little hard to strike an arc on two carbons that have been used before, and when I strike the arc the tube of the rectifier won't sit straight most of the time. I have set my balance weight every way possible, but have not got it right yet. Tell others who may have rectifiers located out-doors to place them inside during the winter. Last winter I had trouble. My rectifier was out-doors and the mercury froze, and so did the one in the other theater in another town nearby, and we had to run on a rheostat until the rectifier tube was placed in the operating room and warmed up, after which it was O. K. Can you give me the address of someone who sells a good rewind which is noiseless? The one I have makes a terrible noise in rewinding, so much so that it annoys the patrons. I would be willing to pay the price for a good one. We have had considerable trouble with Mutual film, which has a tendency to roll up from the sides instead of coming through the machine flat and this in turn causes trouble in the machine.

Brother Culbert did not describe the film trouble closely enough to allow me to form much of any opinion of what it really consists of. As to the mercury freezing up, why I do not think it possible that the mercury actually froze, but it might have been cold enough to become too sluggish to start; I don't know about that. Anyhow, by addressing the Rectifier Sales Department of the General Electric Company, Schenectady, N. Y., you will be provided with a wiring diagram showing you how to connect up the reactance of the rectifier so that in case of tube trouble you can switch right over and use the reactance as a regular economizer, and not have to bother with a rheostat. As regards the rewind, I would suggest that almost any rewind will make a good deal of noise after it has become worn, if run at high speed, due largely to the fact that the reels are seldom anywhere near straight or properly balanced. The Nicholas Power Company, or any of the machine manufacturers, put out very good rewinds, but the thing to do is to run your rewind with a small fan motor geared down to slow speed. Put on the reel, supply a little tension, and let the motor be five minutes in rewinding a film. You can readily arrange, in any one of half a dozen or more different ways, several of which have been described in the department, so that when the film is rewound the current will automatically be cut off from the motor. You can then start the rewind going and leave it to perform its duty slowly and without any noise at all. As to the tube not coming back after rocking, will the Rectifier Sales Department, Schenectady, kindly write friend Culbert about this.

Very Convenient.

R. S. Mueller & Company, Cleveland, Ohio, are putting out a test clip called the "Big Brute," which would be, under certain conditions, a mighty handy thing to have in the operating room. Two of these clips connected to, say, ten feet of stage cable would enable an operator to almost instantly effect temporary repair of a burned-off lamp head, by snapping one clip on a busher or on the end of the lamp-head and the other on the carbon arm of the lamp. This would, of course, only be permissible temporarily in order to finish out a reel. The "Big Brute" can also be used as a lamp holder by attaching an incandescent lamp socket to a clamp fastened under the clip at its lower end. The Brute can then be snapped on any convenient object and the lamp head held right where you want it. The rubber shield can be used, or not used, according to circumstances. When used as a lamp holder there is no need of the shield, but when used for current conveyance the shield would be a necessity. The device is very well made indeed, and I think operators will find them quite useful.

False Pretense.

I. Day Sherman, Texas, sends in a circular put out by what purports to be "The Practical Moving Picture School," Houston, Texas. Brother Day writes a caustic, and somewhat lengthy letter, which is also signed by O. J. Parker, R. E. Ferguson, and James Shipmanall, Sherman operators, who together with Brother Day protest against the school proposition as set forth in the circular in question.

And, indeed, it is an outrage that such institutions should be allowed to exist; the particular thing which makes it an outrage being the following clause in the circular: "Time Required to Complete Course. In our school you are given the actual and practical experience that is required in the regular operation of a motion picture machine. We do not use books of any sort in our course of instruction, giving the students lessons by demonstrations with our machines and other equipment, such as he will have to handle when he finishes our course. This makes it much more easier (Some English. Ed.) for the student to learn, and he need not spend over from fifteen to twenty-five days with us before he knows the business in every detail; and he is then ready to accept a position, or engage in the motion picture business for himself."

It is almost idle to comment on so ridiculous a proposition. The editor of this department has opportunities to learn, as great, if not even greater than any other one man connected with the business. He has been more than four years in his present position, with years of actual operating experience back of that, and yet he learns something about the business almost every day. But here is a "school" which proposes to take men who know nothing whatever about the motion picture business, and make them not only competent operators, but competent managers, all in from fifteen to twenty-five days. Possibly the manager of this "school" has some new method of trepanning the skull of students and squirting in knowledge with a syringe. That is the only way he could accomplish such a truly marvelous result. As a matter of fact, claims of this kind are dishonest; they amount in effect to "obtaining money by false pretenses," and in many instances the proprietors of schools making preposterous claims of this kind have been put out of business by the courts, and in some cases have been accorded the privilege of peering from between nice, strong iron bars for a considerable space of time.

In Fine Condition.

Reading, Pa., says:

> Local 97, I. A. T. S. E., is in fine condition, but there is always room for improvement. Wages are poor, ranging from fifteen up to twenty dollars, which is the limit, and in return for this remuneration the managers want the limit. Here is a funny one. One of our Reading managers gets around quite a little. He is all the time telling us what fine pictures we, the Reading boys, put on, as a whole. Says he has not seen them beat in any of the many cities he has visited. Yet, notwithstanding this, he has not raised his operator's salary one cent. Moreover, there are other Reading managers who have the same ideas. Five of us are getting a few dollars over the scale, but Now what is the use in bragging of the work of your operators, gentlemen, and then paying them a laborer's salary? If the Reading boys are turning out high-class work, as the manager in question affirms, don't you think it would be more to the purpose if you recognized that fact in the pay envelope? Kind words are all very well in their place, but all the kind words in the world won't buy a single soup bone, nor satisfy the wail of the grocer when his bill is due. If the Reading boys put up poor projection, if they were non-progressive and of the dog-in-a-manger type, who neither improved themselves, cared anything about the quality of the picture they put on the screen, nor were willing to allow any one else to improve, then I would have no sympathy for them, but still would want salaries raised, to the end that they be displaced and forced out to make room for better men. But this is not the case in this instance. The boys are delivering the goods, but the managers, on the other hand, are not.

A New Film Box.

H. Rakov, manager Sherwood theater, Canastota, New York, sends in description and illustration of his film box as follows:

> Find enclosed photograph of a new and useful addition to the operating room. The machine is designed to do away with the bothersome and very often dangerous old-style method of handling reels. Every one with experience knows the inconvenience of the present method, particularly with regard to keeping the reels in proper rotation. Valuable time is often lost in looking for the required reel, and it is not an uncommon thing for the wrong one to be placed on the machine, the error only being detected after the projector has started, with resultant delay and vexation to both operator and audience. The new invention does away with all the above, and is besides that, a safeguard against fire. All you have to do is to place the reels in proper rotation inside the cylinder in the first place, putting in as many reels as are required for the day's run. The metal disc inside the cylinder is adjustable for any required number of reels. Now close the cover of the cylinder and your reels are safe against fire, as they are always under cover when not in use. To remove required reel all you have to do is press a lever and the small cover opens automatically, exposing the desired reel, all other reels remaining under cover. To replace a used reel, open large cover over cylinder and put reel in space between metal disc and reel; close the cover and your machine is ready for the next change.

As I understand the matter from the illustration, the cover of the cylinder is arranged in two sections, a large one and a small one, the small one being closed in the illustration. I also assume that the metal disc against the outer reel is held by a spring, though it may be held by the lever spoken of. The idea is not at all a bad one, and I pass it along for the consideration of managers and operators.

A GYPSY MADCAP (Edison), Nov. 24. One of the series of "Olive's Opportunities," written by Mrs. Wilson Woodrow, featuring Mabel Trunnelle as a gypsy girl, supported by Biglow Cooper, Edward Earle, Herbert Prior and a minor cast of gypsies, guides, etc. Several thrilling scenes occur involving the principal character, and up to a certain point the interest is maintained, but the final scenes are lacking in a convincing quality. The acting and photography are adequate.

BEYOND YOUTH'S PARADISE (Essanay), Nov. 24.—Adapted from a Munsey Magazine story. The cast, Lillian Drew, John Cossar, Richard Travers, Helen Dunbar and Bryant Washburn, by their splendid acting make this visualization acceptable. The theme of the plot is not a pleasant one to the casual observer, nor does it contribute greatly to the elevating qualities of pictures. As its caption suggests it is "Beyond Youth's Paradise."

TOUGH LUCK SMITH (Kalem), Nov. 24.—A farce comedy, ably manufactured by C. A. Frambers and portrayed artistically by John E. Brennan, Ethel Teare and able support. There are many ridiculous and funny situations and complications in this picture that are provocative of hilarious laughter. The cause of all the trouble rests on the shoulders of a neglectful and forgetful messenger boy, who gets his in the finale. Can recommend this as a laugh maker.

MOTHER'S BABY BOY (Lubin), Nov. 24.—A burlesque comedy by Epes Winthrop Sargent, which, while it is ludicrous, is creative of much laughter on the part of the spectators. On the same reel with "He Wanted Chickens."

HE WANTED CHICKENS (Lubin), Nov. 24.—This is also a Sargent comedy on the same reel with the above, which posseses much merit but it has been poorly directed. The acting, especially on the part of the wife of the chicken fancier (probably on account of the director), is much exaggerated.

THE SCAPEGOAT (Selig), Nov. 24.—A western drama by Tom Mix, who is also the producer. Heretofore the Tom Mix productions have contained the elements of fascination and reasonableness. In this one the quicksand puddle is farcical. The plot is fairly strong and the acting, photography and selection of backgrounds combine to make it an interesting picture.

THE TEMPLE OF MOLOCH (Edison), Nov. 25.—This picture drama has been reviewed at length by Louis Reeves Harrison in the Moving Picture World, and can be found on page 936, issue of Nov. 14, 1914.

THE FABLE OF AGGIE AND THE AGGRAVATED ATTACKS (Essanay), Nov. 25.—A George Ade comedy which is almost more than funny, featuring Betty Brown, and it is safe to bet(y) did things up "brown"; after surviving all the ills that young flesh is heir to, she fell a victim to a high school diploma. Her parents thought she had gone the limit, but she grabbed photomania, then she got physical culture and refused to take time to eat. Then she succumbed to actoritis, which lived only shortly, killed by the love microbe. See this and wonder.

THE BUTTERFLY'S WINGS (Selig), Nov. 25.—The plot of this story contains little that is of interest to the casual observer. There are many beautiful scenes along the sea coast and Miss Bessie Eyton, while attractive to the eye, gains little sympathy for interfering between two village lovers in their affections for each other. Eventually she gains her just deserts by having her butterfly wings "singed." An ordinary release.

NETTY OR LETTY (Vitagraph), Nov. 25.—A story of a pair of twins—who resemble each other almost as closely as do their dispositions—which are entirely different. The story is a good one, thanks to Roy Forbush Hanaford, and Theodore Marston has used his best efforts, and succeeded in making it laughable. Dorothy Kelly and Lillian Burns wear costumes made off of the same piece of goods, thus the resemblance. James Morrison is not happy in his part; however, it is entertaining.

THE WAY BACK (Biograph), Nov. 26.—A story which might be classed in a certain sense as educational. An evangelist (Alfred Paget), is the leading character, who saves a young woman on the downward path, through frequenting cabarets and marries her to his friend. Later circumstances force him gradually down hill, and she, having become a settlement worker, discovers and regenerates him. A finely acted release, deserving of a wide showing.

SNAKEVILLE'S REFORM WAVE (Essanay), Nov. 26.—A sort of a suffragette movement, with a prohibition annex tacked on, in the plot of which the women run things to suit themselves at the polls, voting Snakeville dry by a large majority. Slippery Slim and Mustang Pete do some awful kicking, but their wives force them to join their procession. This picture is greeted hilariously and will undoubtedly be in great demand.

CAUSE FOR THANKSGIVING (Vitagraph), Nov. 26.—A very pretty comedy of which little Bobby Connelly is the bright particular star. Amongst the many laughable scenes there are touches of emotional simplicity, depicting the longings of a child for a little baby brother and how he attempts to procure one, but he selects the wrong color. However, he is instrumental in supplying their washwoman's Thanksgiving table with a fine big turkey. A most enjoyable Thanksgiving story, in which Bobby does himself proud.

HIS OLD PAL'S SACRIFICE (Biograph), Nov. 27.—A romance of the underworld, showing that gratitude exists even in the minds of those who live an evil life. Charles H. West and William Hartman make very human charatcers of Bob and Lon Riggs, two pals, who have grown up together in the slums. An interesting love story involving Lon Riggs and a good girl is very touching. The acting is artistically done by the entire cast. A pleasing release.

HAM THE ICEMAN (Kalem), Nov. 27.—There is a trite saying, "how would you like to be the iceman?" but the viewer of this picture would hardly care to perform the various strenuous stunts which Lloyd V. Hamilton is called upon to do as the iceman. The whole reel is cram full of laughable situations. It is worth the price of admission to see Hamilton wrestle with cakes of ice. In the finale he disappears in the bubbles to escape his jealous wife. A real laugh maker.

HE WAITS FOREVER (Lubin), Nov. 27.—Photographically this picture is very well done and much beautiful scenery abounds, the plot being laid in Mexico. It has to do with the petty insurrections which are continually occurring there. There is a love theme which has a peculiar ending, and just why Jose, the first lover, should be made by the author to meet with such a sad end, or what he has done to deserve it, is not made at all plain. There is little continuity in the whole construction and the acting taken as a whole is mediocre.

A SURPRISE PARTY (Selig), Nov. 27.—A comedy that is received with laughter, in spots. Amusing complications are built up around a woman's hat, which one wants and the other gets. A great amount of jealousy is caused by misunderstandings, mostly caused by the getting up of a "surprise party." The ending is quite different from what they all expected. The acting is well done. It proves to be an amusing number.

THE CURING OF MYRA MAY (Vitagraph), Nov. 27.—Norma Talmadge gives quite a good illustration of an addle-pated young miss of fourteen, who has romantic ideas, exaggerated by reading love stories. It is all very amusing, particularly where her mother discovers her in a long gown, talking to a man and takes the kinks out of her, sending Myra May back to short dresses and shooing away the man. It is a very amusing comedy and is well acted and produced.

LITTLE MISS MAKE-BELIEVE (Biograph), Nov. 28.—A comedy drama of the original sort and the story is plausible. It is very satisfactory to see how little Miss Make-Believe turns the tables on an aristocratic family who order her to pose as a princess. She also wins the man who the mother and two daughters are attempting to land. Irene Howley does some very natural and clever acting in the title role. A very pleasing release.

THE LAST OF THE HARGROVES (Edison), Nov. 28.—A story of feud life in the hills and valleys, concerning the moonshine element. The photography of the mountain exteriors and the homely interiors of cabins is very creditable. The story is very entertaining and the acting is very well done, especially by Gertrude McCoy, as a sort of wood nymph, and Robert Conness, in the leading roles, the only survivors of the two families, who wipe out the feud by marrying. It is all very interesting.

BRONCHO BILLY'S DOUBLE ESCAPE (Essanay), Nov. 28.—About the most redeeming feature of this release illustrates that a notorious outlaw is possessed with enough honor to keep his word inviolate, when trusted by his captor, a deputy sheriff. The usual riding by cowboys, etc., wild western scenery clearly photographed are involved in this picture. It is as good as the others along this line.

THE GIRL AT THE THROTTLE (Kalem), Nov. 28.—The third episode of "The Hazards of Helen," the railroad series, featuring Helen Holmes. Helen does many thrilling stunts in the action of this picture. There is not a moment that is not exciting. Her handling of a locomotive is marvelous, for a girl. The authors, Mr Matlack and Clark, have created some great situations, and Mr. McGowan, the director, has handled them skilfully. This series seems to be deservedly popular.

YOU CAN'T BEAT THEM (Lubin), Nov. 28.—A short comedy by E. W. Sargent, illustrating how a wife and mother-in-law, by a scheme made up between them, forces hubby, who is a tightwad, to loosen-up. It does not create much of a sensation. On the same reel with "The Servant Girl's Legacy."

THE SERVANT GIRL'S LEGACY (Lubin), Nov. 28.—Another Sargent comedy which is greeted with laughter. The theme is not altogether original, but has been cleverly worked out, and the longer it runs the funnier it gets, until the finish is a howl. On the same reel with "You Can't Beat Them."

THE FATES AND RYAN (Selig), Nov. 28.—A quite different drama, written by Campbell MacCulloch. The leading character is a mounted policeman. A beautiful feature is engrafted showing the love the mounted policeman has for his horse. There is a number of beautiful scenes, most of them being thrilling and exciting. Lamar Johnstone has the leading role, supported by Stella Razeto and George Hernandez. They all sustain in their various roles splendidly. E. J. Le Saint is the producer. This picture can be recommended.

A MOTHER'S WAY (Biograph), Nov. 30.—Kate Bruce, Ivan Christy, Isabel Rea and Charles H. Mailes are in the leads in this picture play, depicting a mother's love for her son, although he is ashamed of her. She comes to him in his hour of desperation. The theme of the plot is not by any means a new one but the director and actors do good work, making of it a pleasing release.

WOOD B. WEDD GOES SNIPE HUNTING (Edison), Nov. 30.—Twelfth of the Wood B. Wedd series. The author, Mark Swan, utilizes an old story to foundation his plot. There is a lot of grotesque business introduced which is more foolish than funny, especially in and about the country hotel. An absurd hat is passe as a laugh creator. Let us hope that several picture comedians will recognize this fact in the near future. Photographically this release can be recommended.

A MAID OF WAR (Essanay), Nov. 30.—A rough and tumble comedy, in which Sweedie, police and bums play prominent parts. The bums, after drinking wine in Sweedie's grog shop, refuse to pay for it, then comes a chase and Sweedie manages to get into the wrong house and break up a wedding party. This release is greeted with laughter from start to finish.

HEARST-SELIG NEWS PICTORIAL, NO. 79 (Selig), Nov. 30.—Several scenes are shown of the Tuckerton, New Jersey, wireless station, which is said to be the tallest in the United States (820 feet high). This station is controlled both by Germany and France, under the censorship of the United States Government; scenes in the cotton-raising section of the United States, illustrating the cultivation and harvesting of the crops; Scottish troops being rehearsed in military tactics now being used at the front, on Salisbury Plain, England; practice, under the supervision of the naval department by United States submarines.

EVERYTHING AGAINST HIM (Vitagraph), Nov. 30.—A western story, which is made up of complications so puzzling that it would take a Philadelphia lawyer to work it out. Anyhow, circumstantial evidence convicts an innocent man of committing a murder. Later his supposed victim puts in an appearance which contradicts the court's conclusions. Alfred Marquis is the author and Ulysses Davis is the director. Little enthusiasm emanates from the audience to greet this visualization; perhaps because there is not a female in the cast, and they can be missed.

Licensed Specials

THE OLD FLUTE PLAYER (Vitagraph), Nov. 24.—A special feature in two parts, featuring Charles Kent in the title role. It is written by C. T. Dazey and Ed. Marshall, in book form, and adapted by Eugene Mullen. The many complications in this story are beautifully worked out, and Mr. Kent makes of the old flute player a most lovable character, whose devotion to his motherless daughter is full of pathos. An admirable and exceptional picture in all respects. Edith Storey and Antonio Moreno deserve commendation for artistic work.

THE ROMANCE OF A POOR YOUNG MAN (Biograph), Nov. 24.—Visualized from Octave Feuillet's novel of the same caption, in two reels. The dramatic version of this story created a sensation and enjoyed a long run in Europe, and this country, when produced in the dramatic version by Lester Wallack on Broadway, years ago. The picture production reflects credit on the part of the director and actors. Edward Cecil, in a dual role, and Charles H. Mailes deserve credit for superior work. The photography and appropriate backgrounds, with the acting, make this a superior picture drama.

THE GIRL AND THE EXPLORER (Kalem), Nov. 25.—A two-act romantic comedy, featuring Tom Moore and Marguerite Courtot. There are many thriling incidents in a mild sort of a way involved in this plot, concerning the adventures of an explorer and the risks an editor's daughter incurs to secure the rights of his story for her father's publication. The ending is original in conception and the lovers win out, to the chagrin of all the others concerned, including papa. It has a humorous finish.

THE MAKING OF HIM (Lubin), Nov. 25.—This two-part picture play contains elements that are not embraced in the ordinary love story. It is educational in its scenes, from the fact that numerous illustrations are shown on the training grounds at the Newport Naval Station. The photography is excellent, and considerable comedy develops in the love episode; concerning three aspirants for a debutante hand. A fine release.

WAS HIS DECISION RIGHT (Lubin), Nov. 26.—This two-part visualization is paradoxical in its construction and it contains many weak scenes which spoil the general effect, telling the story of a young girl's life in a struggle for existence. She takes the "easiest way," through discouragement, and later is redeemed by a minister. There seems to be a lack of convincing qualities in the acting as well as in the plot. It will hardly stand thinking over thoroughly.

THE KING'S MOVE IN THE CITY (Edison), Nov. 27.—One of the "Adventures of young Lord Stranleigh" stories, by Robert Barr, featuring Marc McDermott. In this two-part release Charles J. Brabin has done some excellent work in the direction. While the story is of compelling interest, Mr. McDermott injects a great amount of quiet comedy in his character. This picture will easily class as the feature on any program. It is well made and acted, on a high plane.

SCARS OF POSSESSION (Essanay), Nov. 27.—A two-part original and touching love story. The author has used the surgical operation of blood transfusion as the main theme of this story, combining it with a love episode which is brought to a satisfactory terminaiton. Francis X. Bushman and Beverly Bayne are the central figures. The acting is delightful. All the details in this production deserve mention. It is received with evidenced appreciation by the audience.

CONVICT, COSTUMES AND CONFUSION (Vitagraph), Nov. 28.—A special two-part feature for which the author, A. L. Stillman, deserves credit. Billy Quirk has the leading role of "Leary Mike," a convict, who escapes and creates the confusion. Lee Beggs is the director and also plays the part of Jones, who is a gay old sport and the owner of a termagant wife, who is always on the job (Rica Allen). The action is fast and furious but not of the slap-stick order, and the scenes are numerous and varied in locations, the funniest of them being at the beach, where a mix-up of apparel takes place. A Mephisto costume cuts a big figure in the plot. This comedy is a crackerjack.

UNREST (Selig), Nov. 30.—A psychological drama in two parts, written by W. E. Wing and produced by Thomas Santschi, who essays the leading role, supported by Bessie Eyton. This is an out-of-the-ordinary picture play, full of intense moments. A vein of love permeates through the plot, involving a spirited automobile race and a pretended drowning, which culminates in a wedding. The scenes are clearly photographed. All in the cast do excellent work. This is a good release.

HER BITTER LESSON (Kalem), Nov. 30.—A two-part picture in which an extravagant, selfish and deceitful wife is very much in evidence. Not much can be said in its favor, as the plot is not a wholesome one. The finale is somewhat better, for, after many failures, the wife learns her bitter lesson. Hamilton Smith is the author and Robert G. Vignola producer. The cast, which is an all-star one, does excellent work.

Independent

THE BEST MAN (Frontier), Nov. 28.—A Western number of average interest, in which the husband becomes jealous of one whom the wife refers to as "the best man." The husband deserts and becomes a bandit, but the best man brings him back. The plot has a good motive, but the treatment is not strong and the photography is uneven.

LOVE, LUCK AND CANDY (Sterling), Dec. 3.—Park, girl, male flirt, policeman, trouble. This eccentric comedy is well-photographed, but the humor is not very pronounced. The latter scenes leading up to the explosion were best.

THE HIGHER IMPULSE (Eclair), Dec. 6.—This story of a drunken father who comes home and beats his wife and son is too much given up to sordid scenes. There is nothing about it to appeal to the observer, though the motive behind the picture was evidently commendable. The photography is only fair.

FIDO'S DRAMATIC CAREER (L-KO), Dec. 6.—An amusing story of a dog named Fido. He wanders about and finally goes to sleep on the grounds of a big estate. He dreams of attending a dog fight. This is full of interest. Fido drives an auto to the fight and smokes a pipe during the rounds. Other dogs and a chimpanzee and goat add to the fun, which winds up with a big chase. A good animal yarn, well-pictured throughout.

BILLY'S CHARGE (Sterling), Dec. 7.—Little Billy neglects his baby sister. The big dog proves her friend and saves her from drowning. The latter feature was the most interesting, but would have gotten over more strongly if the baby had not cried so continuously. The picture closes with everyone safe at home.

VIVIAN'S COOKIES (Crystal), Dec. 8.—The young husband brings home some politicians to dine and Vivian feeds them on some cookies into the dough of which the child poured some liniment. This contains quite a pleasing idea and is well photographed.

WHOSE BABY? (Crystal), Dec. 8.—On same reel with above. The mother steals her own child from the careless nurse to teach her a lesson. The child then gets into real trouble. This is fairly amusing.

THE WIDOW'S LAST (Nestor), Dec. 8.—A little comedy of everyday life, not very strong as to plot. The widow with the bad boy repairs the wrong done by the lad in breaking the shoemaker's window, by nursing the old man through an illness. This, of course, leads to a marriage.

THE GENII AND THE VASE (Joker), Dec. 9.—Ernest Shield appears in this as a sailor boy fishing. He pulls up a vase and in his dream a genii appears. There is some amusing trick photography in some of the sudden transformation scenes. Several of the situations are laughable.

HIS NEW JOB (Sterling), Dec. 10.—Willie Walrus appears in this burlesque number as porter in a hotel. There is a mix-up among the various guests and some rather rough knockabout work. This is amusing in spots.

THEIR UPS AND DOWNS (Nestor), Dec. 11.—A light comedy enacted on a short street railway in Los Angeles known as Angel's Flight. The angry husband has a great time chasing his wife and the music teacher up and down the incline. The setting makes a good one for a pleasing novelty of this kind.

ANIMATED WEEKLY, NO. 142, Nov. 25.—Scenes on a German warship, a picture of the Santa Claus ship leaving America, views of the Kaiser and other timely subjects are included in this number. Hy Mayer drawings at the close.

THE WILD AND WOOLLY WEST (Princess), Nov. 27.—This is a sort of "see Colorado first" offering. The story is almost nil; but it has some fine views of the Garden of Gods and other points. The photography is clear and good.

A DENVER ROMANCE (Thanhouser), Nov. 29.—A kind of "see Denver grow" picture, with some fine pictures of the western metropolis. It pretends to tell a story; but this is of little interest. The photography is fine.

AMONG THE MOURNERS (Keystone), Nov. 28.—All will laugh over this most comical farce. It is funny, well acted and the mechanical work is perfect. It is one of the truly funny ones. There is nothing especially vulgar in it and most of it is laugh compelling.

LEADING LIZZY ASTRAY (Keystone), Nov. 30.—We think that people will find this farce amusing. Most will laugh.

NAIDRA, THE DREAM WOMAN (Thanhouser), Dec. 4.—An old man dreams he has made a beautiful woman by following the mystic formula taken from an old alchemistic book he has stumbled on in a book stall. The professor thinks he owns the "dream"; but she falls in love with the organist of a church. Until this latter episode begins there is little suspense; but after it the picture holds strongly. The acting is good and it has many poetical and very pleasing pictures. It may be called an artistic offering.

A CORNER IN HATS (Komic), Nov. 29.—An excellent little feature of light comedy type, in which a pet dog has a mania for stealing hats and bringing them home. The young husband becomes very jealous and numerous quarrels follow. The photography is good and the production gets up quite a lot of amusement.

THE OLD "GOOD-FOR-NOTHING" (Majestic), Dec. 1.—The story of an old inventor whose invention makes good after it has been condemned by the proposed purchasers. Spottiswoode Aitken makes a sympathetic part out of the inventor. There is, of course, a love story included and the good photography helps to place the production somewhat above the average.

CUPID AND A DRESS COAT (Beauty), Dec. 1.—A pleasing comedy number enacted by an attractive cast which includes Marguerita Fischer, Harry Pollard and Joseph Harris. The ball room scenes are attractively photographed and the comedy of the split coat and borrowed ring gets over nicely. Good society comedy.

THE STRENGTH O' TEN (American), Dec. 2.—A mountain story, with Wm. Garwood and Vivian Rich as the lovers and Jack Richardson and Reaves Eaton also in the cast. Jep's feat in knocking down ten men did not seem extremely plausible, but the picture is entertaining and makes a good story. The sub-titles were carefully prepared and convey a good mountain lingo. This is pleasing and well-photographed.

THE LUCKY SHOT (Reliance), Dec. 2.—This story of a young married man who goes West to make a fortune for his wife and child is very conventional in plot. The bandit's bullet misses him and discloses gold in the face of the cliff. Well-constructed and nicely photographed but familiar in plot.

HELLO GIRL OF COYOTE CAMP (Warner's).—A Premier offering dealing with western life and one that holds us in suspense with terror and horror. It succeeds, and though it is carelessly directed in the small things, it is a true thriller.

ONE ON CHARLEY (Warner's).—A Surperba picture featuring Charles De Forrest. It has an excellent idea for a farce and makes a fair to middling offering. Some of the acting is very amusing.

THE GATES OF JEALOUSY (Pathe).—A one-reel farce made in the American studio. It is possible that some may think it funny; we cannot say we did. It is all so unreal that the humor evaporates.

Independent Specials

THE KAFFIR'S SKULL (Reliance), Nov. 28.—This is James F. Dyer's short story picturized in two reels by John Adolphi. It is interesting and makes a fairly good offering, although the subject matter, in spite of new atmosphere, has a touch of oldness. There is a diamond hidden in a skull and sent to a girl in America by her uncle, who knows that he is to be killed. The villain comes to America and, by a train of incidents rather unconvincing when taken together, gets possession of the skull, but is disappointed. The rightful owner later finds the gem.

THE SISTERS (Majestic), Nov. 29.—Dorothy and Lillian Gish have the leads together in this deeply emotional picture (two reels). The story makes us intimately acquainted with a little family history. It tells us the love stories of the two sisters and follows for a few years after their marriages. It is deeply dramatic, beautifully acted, and is one of those offerings that awaken enthusiasm. The author and director of the picture is Christie Cabanne. He has done good work.

THE BEGGAR CHILD (American), Nov. 30.—An unusually good subject is this two-reel story of an artist who adopts a little beggar girl. The cast includes Edward Coxen, Winifred Greenwood, George Field, Charlotte Burton and others. The girl grows up and is saved from the clutches of a designing count by Rosa, the girl he had wronged. The trick marriage was well handled. The complications in this are interesting throughout, but it is particularly strong in the way of good photography and pleasing settings. The interiors and garden scenes are full of charm. A good offering.

THE CENTER OF THE WEB (Thanhouser), Dec. 1.—This two-reel picture gets special distinction from the astonishing work of a big pack of police dogs. They make it a very desirable offering, one that ought not to be missed. The story is good on its own merits and tells how a detective, captured by a gang of counterfeiters, is saved by the coming of the authorities led by the dogs. The zeal and astonishing ability of the dogs to pick each a victim among the counterfeiters and so to insure the capture of each and every one of them is a "sure enough" thrilling feature. It is a well handled and clearly pictured offering.

FATTY'S MINNIE-HE-HAW (Keystone), Dec. 7. A two-reel subject in which Roscoe Arbuckle, the Fat Boy, falls in with a tribe of Indians. The big squaw wants to wed him. The Indians apparently enjoyed the humor of the situation and there are some very entertaining scenes in this. Some of the humor is rather coarse. Fatty's ride on the broncho and the squaw's pursuit were laughable. The photography is excellent throughout.

THE MYSTERY OF THE DUTCH CHEESEMAKER (Thanhouser), Dec. 7.—Episode 3 of the Zudora series. This gets up a mystery that is baffling indeed, showing the manner in which the manufactured diamonds are transferred to the interior of Swiss cheese. Zudora solves the problem where all others had failed, demonstrating how mice had carried the diamonds on their sticky noses. This denouement may not strike many observers as extremely probable, but the two-reel offering is certainly well constructed and holds the interest throughout.

THE CITY OF DARKNESS (Broncho), Dec. 9.—A sensational two-reel offering of love and politics. The brother of the governor is falsely accused of murder by a ward politician who desires revenge on the governor. The youth, portrayed effectively by Charles Ray, is sentenced to the chair. The governor refuses to pardon him, but learns his innocence at the last moment. The death in the chair is avoided by throwing off the current at the power house, plunging the entire city into darkness. This is frankly sensational and is handled with a degree of suspense that makes it effective for this type of offering. The photography and acting are good.

NOT OF THE FLOCK (Domino), Dec. 10.—An appealing two-reel number, enacted by a pleasing cast, which includes Charles Ray and Enid Markey, we believe, as the girl. The hoydenish daughter of the roadhouse keeper was particularly well handled, the girl who interpreted this part, acting with unusual freedom. She saves the banker's daughter from the plotting young city man and wins the love of the young pastor. This production holds the attention closely throughout. The plot is somewhat familiar in trend, but the presentation is far above the ordinary and the photography is pleasing. A good offering.

THE FORTUNES OF WAR (Kay Bee), Dec. 11.—A two-reel picture by T. H. Ince and W. H. Clifford, with plenty of fine, spirited action. The scenes are laid in Mexico. Its heroine is the daughter of a wealthy planter who favors Huerta's side. Her father's foreman is a revolutionist and the two are in love. The backgrounds, the acting and the general management of the offering are of high grade.

TREY O' HEARTS, SERIES NO. 14, "THE FIRST LAW" (Gold Seal), Nov. 3.—The fourteenth two-reel episode of The Trey o' Hearts series abounds in mountain scenery. Rose and Alan and Barcus and Judith continue their adventures, pursued by Trine and Marrophat. The most exciting portion of this installment is the fall down an abruptly sloping cliff and subsequent climb back to safety. There is no particular change in the general relation of characters. Some good double exposure results are obtained.

THE LION, THE LAMB AND THE MAN (Rex), Dec. 6.—A two-reel offering beginning with characters in modern life, consisting of the girl and her two lovers. The girl, played by Pauline Bush, has come to the Kentucky mountains, where the two brothers fall in love with her. One is strong and brutal by nature and wrestles bare-handed with a wolf. The other brother is crafty and sets a shotgun, attached to a string, to kill the stronger one. The whole story then flashes back to the Stone age and the three appear in skins. This has been done frequently in about the same way. It always possesses a certain amount of interest. This is handled with a fair degree of strength.

THE INN OF THE WINGED GODS (Victor), Dec. 7.—The third two-reel number featuring Warren Kerrigan as Terence O'Rourke, soldier of fortune. He meets the masquerading duchess at the inn and fights an exciting duel with the two conspirators, killing the prince. The story is a detached episode, well-constructed and full of the right romantic spirit. The love affair between Terence and Beatrix continues through the series, though Terence occasionally lapses from grace, in this case stealing a kiss from the duchess-barmaid. The fencing scenes were excellently staged.

THE MASTER KEY (Universal Special), Dec. 7.—Episode 4. In this two-reel installment Wilkerson and Mrs. Darnell get their conspiracy to working. Ruth is sent to San Francisco to meet Everett and raise funds for the mine. Mrs. Darnell and George meet her on the train at Sacramento and she readily falls a victim to their plot. This is interesting and worked out very plausibly. John Dore, scenting trouble, starts to San Francisco to search for Ruth. Wilkerson cripples his auto and sets fire to a bridge. Dore leaps to safety, but the machine crashes through the bridge. This is realistically shown.

THE THREE MEN WHO KNEW (Imp), Dec. 10.—A good example of the weird and uncanny type of picture. Three men who desecrate a Hindu temple are pursued by remorseless fate, until each one dies, also the wife of one of them. The opening scenes in the temple, where the three men stick a cigarette in the idol's mouth and the temple falls, are well pictured. Later the mystic fear overtakes them and the men in turn are brought to death by the relentless Hindu servant who follows them to this country. This is a strong offering of its type.

THE LITTLE GRAY HOME (Victor), Dec. 11.—A very pleasing two-reel number, with Harry C. Meyers, Rosemary Theby and Brinsley Shaw in the cast. The happiness of the young playwright's home is threatened by the actress in his play. But the young wife's clubman friend, instead of playing the usual role of villain, comes to the rescue by diverting the attention of the actress to himself. This presents a simple theme in a convincing manner. The cast is agreeable, the acting sincere and the photography good. A pleasing offering.

THE TRAIL BREAKERS (Bison), Dec. 12.—A two-reel railroad story enacted by a cast including Wm. Clifford, Val Paul, Marie Wolcamp and Sherman Bainbridge. This has the swift action and suspense usually achieved by these performers. The girl and her lover are allied with rival construction camps, but manage to win happiness after many tribulations. The big scene is the running fight between the Indians on the train and the cowboys on horseback; this is excellently staged. The photography is good and the construction camp makes a pleasing setting for the story. A lively Western number.

THROUGH SHADOWS TO SUNSHINE (Warner's).—A two-reel Mittenthall melodrama, old style; but it "has the goods" for the audience that likes sensational situations and doesn't care if crude spots come between highly emotional points.

THIRTY YEARS OF A GAMBLER'S LIFE (Pathe).—More interesting than the promise of its rather non-descriptive title, this three-reel picture in France works up to a dramatic situation that holds strongly. If it had devoted its whole attention to this and contented itself with merely sketching out the experiences of the man through the earlier years, it might have been a big dramatic offering. The cast was competent to put a big story over and it has been directed by a skillful hand. It is very interesting as it is; for it is not a tract; but the life story of a family the father of which ruins himself through gaming.

USE VIRGINIA HARNED'S ESTATE IN PICTURE.

The beautiful estate owned by Virginia Harned, former star under Charles Frohman, located at Harrison, New York, is being used by the Wonderful Play and Players Corporation to stage the outdoor scenes in a film version of "The Idler," in which Catherine Countiss, Claire Whitney and Charles Richmond will appear in the leading roles. The director of the picture, Lloyd B. Carleton, was stage director for Charles Frohman when Virginia Harned was his star, and, because of the personal friendship existing between actress and director, it was easy for Mr. Carleton to secure the consent of Miss Harned to the use of her beautiful grounds in staging the exterior. Almost 200 people will be used in the picture and will motor to Harrison where the film is about to be taken.

"In the Name of the Prince of Peace"

War Scornfully Tramples on the Altar of Prince of Peace in Four-Reel World Film Offering.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

THE object of this picture, produced by J. Searle Dawley for the Dreyda Art Film Corporation and offered on the World Film program, is to show up war in a hateful light. It can hardly be said to have a hero in the usual sense of the word; for the story has nothing romantic except in its opening episode which has hardly any part at all in the final meaning of the picture. The big scenes are set between the lines of the German and French armies and at a monastery. The action through these scenes is dramatic, unusual and most decidedly holds.

A foolish prank for which her father won't forgive her has driven a German girl to a French convent. War is declared. The nun's father comes to the monastery which has been taken by the French soldiers and the daughter recognizes him. Fighting is going on; but a wounded soldier overhears her half-smothered exclamation. There is a dramatic struggle to get the nun to denounce her father. She is trapped into an oath on her cross and tells who he is. They are fighting to keep the Germans from capturing the convent and big field guns are shooting through openings in its walls on both sides of its big church altar. The priests and the nuns have just come in and amid the smoke and flying destruction have said mass. When they leave, the nun's father is brought in and with the respect from his soldier captors that the occasion demanded is ordered to step up on the altar stairs and there shot dead. This is War's insult to the Prince of Peace. Its purpose is clear; but the particular sacrilege is far from typical. Thus an untruthful incident is used to symbolize a typical truth, so that it both lies and tells the more distant truth that the author wanted. There are arguments to justify it. We do not consider it strong and personally count it more of a hindrance—audacious and full of effect as it is—than a help toward the author's final impression. We didn't see it with an audience.

The acting is weak in places and the general direction is not remarkably strong especially in the first reel, where the atmosphere, ostensibly German, was as American as could be. The photography was good. As an offering this has much to commend it; but it is below the World Film Average.

PICTURE REALISM IMPOSSIBLE ON STAGE.

"The moving pictures reach everybody just as the earliest dramas reached the people through being given at monasteries, then the center of medieval democracy," declared Dr. D. K. Dodge in a lecture at the University of Illinois on "The Elizabethan Drama and the Motion Pictures." Moving picture producers get realism impossible on the "legitimate" stage, he told the students.

UNIQUE PUBLICITY SCHEME.

The Interstate Films Company, of Philadelphia, handling "The Master Key" for the Universal Company, is doing considerable novelty advertising. It has prepared a gilt key of the "Yale" type with the title of the play and the name of the author printed in black, which is attached to a keyring. These souvenirs can be obtained at a nominal cost from any of the exchanges of the Universal Company or direct from the Interstate Film Company.

J. L. Warner, Film Man

ONE of the brightest of a family of brothers who have accomplished things, J. L. Warner has struck out in business for himself. He has organized the J. L. Warner Film Company of San Francisco, with offices in the Pacific Building. "Jack," as he is known to his friends, will open his doors within a few days with a complete line of high-class feature attractions, ranging in length from two reels up, and Mr. Warner says on the "up" there is no limit. He adds that he intends to handle nothing but the best the market affords, and will do it on the open territory plan. His operations will cover the Pacific Coast—and that's a big place.

J. L. Warner.

Mr. Warner has been in New York City for the past five weeks looking over the market and making selections of films. One of the captures he is taking back with him is a list of twenty-two three-reel productions of the Eclair studios. "Alone in New York," a five-part melodramatic subject, Mr. Warner also will book for the entire coast. Through his foreign connections he will be enabled to acquire European productions. Mr. Warner is one of the founders of Warner's Features. He has been in the film business for ten years. He was associated with his brothers in exchanges in the old days before the formation of the General Film Company. He has had a wide experience and has an extensive acquaintance in the industry, having traveled all over the country. For nearly the past year Mr. Warner has been district manager for the Pacific Coast of Warner's Features. Prior to that he was traveling representative.

While in the city, Mr. Warner paid a pleasant visit at the office of the Moving Picture World. He has a way with him that spells success; that he will attain it is the hope as it is the belief of a wide circle of friends. It is also pertinent to note that Mr. Warner has recently joined the ranks of the Benedicts. We refer to him for particulars.

PICTURE THEATERS NOT A RENDEZVOUS FOR FLIRTS.

The idea of segregating moving picture patrons is not popular in Milwaukee, Wis. Mayor Bading says that if conditions are as bad as painted by some people, who declare that photoplay houses are infested by flirts, all of them should be closed, but he believes there is no cause for alarm. Secretary Charles H. Phillips, of the Citizen's Commission on Motion Pictures, declares that he is in close touch with the conduct of Milwaukee houses and that there is no noticeable annoying of unescorted women. His commission will strenuously oppose any ordinance along this line. Incidentally, three chorus girls were sent out by a Chicago paper to record their experiences with men flirts. In an attempt to verify the assertion that women were molested in moving picture houses they went to photoplay shows, but their visits were uneventful.

PORTLAND'S $100,000 PICTURE THEATER.

The National Amusement Company of Portland, Ore., opened on October 29, the National at Park, Stark and West Park streets in that city. The house represents an expenditure of $100,000. It has seating accommodations for 1,500, and since the opening date has been playing to capacity business.

It has many features, among which is a children's playground. This improvement indicates one of the best innovations in picture theater construction, and it is meeting with pronounced success. The policy of the house is moving pictures with refined singing and musical turns. Melvin G. Winstock is the manager. The National will be given an extended illustrated write-up in an early issue.

The Motion Picture Exhibitor

PENNSYLVANIA EXHIBITORS CONFER.

Advised to Demand Censor Law Repeal by Senator Penrose —Preparing for Big Convention at Harrisburg.

AT the headquarters of the Exhibitors' League in Philadelphia on Monday, November 30, there was held a conference which it is believed by those present will have important results for the exhibitors of Pennsylvania.

Among those present were J. H. Butner, of the Mutual Film Corporation, of Philadelphia, and V. R. Karrick, of the Interstate Film Company, representing the exchanges; C. P. Cropper, business manager of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Philadelphia; W. Spears, vice-president of the local league; Gilbert Miller, of Plymouth; Ben Zerr, of Reading, first vice-president for Pennsylvania of the League; Peter Magaro, of the Harrisburg Exhibitors' Association; Henry Polk, of the Pittsburgh Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association, and Fred J. Herrington, of Pittsburgh, president of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association of Pennsylvania. Attending the session, which lasted for an hour and a half, were State Senator Joseph H. Thompson, of the western part of the state, formerly attorney of the Pittsburgh local, and United States Senator Boies Penrose.

Mr. Cropper was chairman of the delegation. Speeches were made by Messrs. Spears, Butner, Carrick, Polk and Herrington. Among the subjects discussed were the vital ones of censorship and the proposed changes in the building code, the latter being as offensive to the exhibitors as the former.

Senator Penrose, after listening to the arguments of the speakers, promised them his assistance, but impressed upon all the necessity of getting in touch with their legislative representatives so that there might be no question as to the attitude of the exhibitors. As to the censorship, the Senator advised the picture men present not to think of compromise, but to make a straight-cut fight for the elimination of censorship.

Mr. Herrington, who with Mr. Polk made a flying trip to New York following the conference, said the exhibitors in the western part of the state were promising active assistance in the legislative campaign. As to the coming state convention, which is to be held at Harrisburg on January 26, 27 and 28, instead of earlier in the month as originally planned, Mr. Herrington predicted the largest gathering of exhibitors ever held in any state, judging by the way every one is now working. He wanted to impress on the exhibitors of Pennsylvania that unless they came in large numbers to the convention, Harrisburg, being the capital, was a good place to stay away from. It was imperative to have numbers to impress the legislators with the exhibitors' earnestness. Mr. Herrington said there should be a gathering of from seven to nine hundred. The convention, he pointed out, was to be a general one, with no organization dominant. He said an election would be held following the formation of a state organization, which in all probability will become a part of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America.

Mr. Herrington said his visit to New York was primarily to interest the three chief organizations of manufacturers in the exhibit to be held in conjunction with the convention and that he had been promised full co-operation. He pointed out that the chief aim of those booming the convention was to make it a business affair, eliminating all entertainment that might serve to divert attention. It was possible there might be a banquet at the conclusion.

PITTSBURGH SCREEN CLUB POPULAR.

The enthusiasm created at the forming of the Pittsburgh Screen Club at the Fort Pitt Hotel, Pittsburgh, Pa., Sunday, November 5, does not look like it might be a thing of the past, but destined to continue, according to the large number of applications received and by the activity of the officers of the club. The Board of Governors have already met twice in the office of Harvey B. Day, at which times they discussed the matter of a permanent location and took steps to formulate a constitution and a set of by-laws therefor. If all signs do not fail, the prediction is that the Pittsburgh Screen Club will become one of the largest bodies of its kind in the country.

The officers are making efforts to secure copies of the constitution and by-laws of similar organizations in various parts of the country. President of the Board of Governors of the Reel Club of Chicago, Warren A. Patrick, states in a letter that their constitution and bylaws are now in the hands of the printer and that he will forward a copy as soon as they are issued.

NEW YORK EXHIBITORS' BALL.

Preparations for the Big Annual Function Are Extensive and Complete in all Details.

IF enthusiasm counts for anything, the forthcoming ball of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association is to be an affair without precedent for its size and gayety. As an example of the interest shown by the manufacturers, exchangemen and exhibitors, it may be cited that Essanay Film Manufacturing Company, headed by Francis X. Bushman, is making a special trip from Chicago for the sole purpose of attending the affair. The same may be said of the Lubin Company, whose players are coming from Philadelphia for the same purpose.

A casual glance through the names of the box holders shows that the elite of the trade have already reserved places. The following are those who have reserved boxes and the proportions of the affair may be gleaned from the importance of the names: Vitagraph Company of America, Biograph Company, Mutual Film Corporation, Universal Film Manufacturing Company, General Film Company, Thanhouser, Box Office Attractions Company, Edison Company, Picture Playhouse Film Company, Eclectic Film Company, Alliance Program, Nicholas Power Company, Greater New York Film Company, Motion Picture World, Morning Telegraph, Motion Picture News, Life Photo Film Company, Crystal Films, Kalem Company, Exclusive Features, Jesse Lasky, Warner's Features, Precision Machine Company, Geo. Kleine Attractions, Wurlitzer Company, World Film Corporation, Sherry Feature Film Company, Paramount Pictures, Alco Film Corporation, All-Star Feature Film Corporation, Shubert Features, Wm. A. Brady Features, Peerless Features, and many others.

Practically every exhibitor in the Greater City has reported that requests from patrons for tickets have been larger than at any time prior to the four annual functions that have been given by the association, and it seems that everybody that is anybody will be on hand to participate in this joyous occasion.

To accommodate the largest crowd possible with comfort, the committee who has the ball in charge has stinted no expense, and they have secured the largest hall in New York City, the Grand Central Palace, which is at Lexington avenue and 46th street, can easily accommodate 50,000 people. They have also spared no expense in costly decorations and the boxes, which were built especially for the ball, will be a creation of a master mind in architecture. Some of the surprises planned will be remembered a long time by those present.

Recognizing that this is the age of the dance, the committee has secured the services of an orchestra of 50 dance music artists for those who are fond of the hesitation, one-step and fox trot. Four modern motion picture theaters have been built for those who cannot dance or for those who are too tired.

The four floors of the Palace will be given over to the ball. Four bands of music have been engaged for the dancers, so that there will be room in plenty for all comers.

One novel feature of this occasion will be four theaters in which motion pictures will be shown—the latest product of the several makers.

The sextette grand march of favorite photoplayers is a big feature that has aroused unusual interest and practically every photoplayer of note in the motion picture trade will participate in the march. Among those who have signified their intention of being present are numerous city officials, commissioners, heads of departments and others. Also there will be present a number of supreme court judges.

The committee, of which Adolph Weiss is chairman, has very unselfishly devoted all its time for the purpose of making this affair a success, and the sole topic of conversation throughout the moving picture theaters of the city, in all the film exchanges, and at all the manufacturers' offices and studios is the moving picture ball on Monday night, December 7, 1914.

BIG TIME AT BOSTON BALL.

Governor Walsh Leads the Grand March with Mary Pickford—Both Stars Get Big Ovation—More Than 8,000 People Present.

(Special to the World.)

THE second annual ball of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Massachusetts, which has just closed at the Boston Arena, 4:30 a. m. Thursday December 3, has, in the words of Governor David I Walsh, opened the eyes of the public of Boston. It has been a big night.

When the Knickerbocker Limited reached South Station 6 o'clock last night, there were many machines waiting to convey to the Copley Plaza Hotel the New York players and film men who had made the trip. Headed by a band which played alternately "There'll Be a Hot Time" and "Tipperary," the procession, by a rounabout route, reached its destination, where dinner awaited.

The sight in the Boston Arena a little after 9 o'clock Wednesday night was an unusual one. Eight thousand persons at a conservative calculation were in the building. They were there for one purpose—to see in the flesh the players with whose screen identity they were so familiar.

It was late when Miss Mary Pickford reached the hall, much after 11 o'clock, but the reception she got is one she will remember. The Governor of Massachusetts arrived somewhat later, but the volume of sound that greeted him did not nearly equal that accorded the appearance of the players. The Governor impressed every one as being a regular fellow. It was 2 o'clock when he left the hall. He had led the grand march with Miss Pickford and he had assisted in judging the dancing contests. There were nine large cups awarded. Each of the players was greeted on arrival and throngs surged about the boxes where they made their headquarters.

It was 2:30 o'clock or more when about 300 exhibitors and guests sat down to a repast. A few speeches were made. The exhibitors of Massachusetts were congratulated on the success of their ball.

Among those who made the trip from New York were: Mr. and Mrs. Adolph Zukor, Mr. and Mrs. Jesse L. Lasky, Ad. Kessel, Charles O. Baumann, James Kirkwood, Lewis J. Selznick, Harry Reichenbach, Clara Kimball Young, Vivian Martin, Miss M. C. Kenney, Paul Panzer, Pearl White, Edwin August, Hal August, James Cruze, Marguerite Snow, Edith Storey, Mrs. Storey, Harry Benham, William Wadsworth, Mary Pickford, Arthur Housman, Abe Levy, Ed, Rush, Samuel Spedon, Hughie Mack, Russell K. Dougherty, Gladys Hulette, Viola Dana, L. W. McChesney, Florence Labadie, Jacob Wilk, Mr. and Mrs. Bert Ennis and George Bunny.

GEORGE BLAISDELL.

GUSTAVE FROHMAN IN PICTURE FIELD.

Gustave Frohman, second oldest of the three brothers whose name is synonymous with drama in America, has capitulated to the call of the photoplay, having become president of the Frohman Amusement Corporation, with offices at 18 East 41st street, New York. His entry into the new field is the more significant because, while he blazed the way for his older brother, Daniel, and his younger brother, Charles, in the theatrical world, he was last of the three to respond to the call of the screen.

Associated with Mr. Frohman on the business end of the new concern are William L. Sherrill as vice-president and general manager, and S. H. Boynton as secretary and treasurer. Mr. Sherrill is a man of broad experience and wide acquaintance throughout the United States in the investment field, and especially in the fire and life insurance business.

Work has begun on the company's first feature offering, "The Fairy and the Waif." The policy will be to produce original photoplays of unexceptionable cleanliness and of originality. No book of dramatic adaptations will be given. George Irving has been engaged as producing director, and Ralph Dean as assistant.

FILM COMPANIES HAILED TO COURT.

Thirty-two Tenants of the World's Tower Charged with Violating Law Relating to Storage.

REPRESENTATIVES of thirty-two film companies having offices in the World's Tower Building, 110 West Fortieth street, New York City, were held for trial in Special Sessions by Magistrate Barlow in the Yorkville Court on Saturday, November 28. They were charged with violating the law relative to the storage of films. The Fire Department made the claim that the companies had no permit entitling them to store films. The fire the preceding week in a Forty-fifth street structure is alleged to have precipitated the action of the authorities. Inspector Mendel of the Bureau of Fire Prevention said that, while the World's Tower was supposed to be fireproof, the presence of the films made it dangerous.

Edward W. Browning, the builder and owner of the World's Tower, was in a fighting mood when seen by a World man Monday morning. He said his structure was absolutely fireproof—that there was not a bit of wood in its construction. He took the reporter through some of the rooms, called attention to the steel rails on the steel bannisters; to the steel office doors, each of them weighing 200 pounds; to the elaborate fire tower which in no ordinary sense is a fire escape. It is an inclosed passageway, cut off entirely from the building proper. On each floor a door leads on to an exposed platform and then into a tower. Once closed, there is no return; one must continue to the exit at the street. Smoke cannot enter.

Mr. Browning pointed out that the windows, even to the casings, also are of steel; the window panes are of wired polished glass. He said that into the construction of the building had gone the experience gained in twenty years of study as to most approved methods of fireproofing and that if the World's Tower be not fireproof, then there is no such condition. He had aimed not only to avoid the danger from flame, but also from smoke, which he pointed out was more dangerous as a rule than a blaze.

Mr. Browning, during the week, has been holding conferences with the city authorities in an effort to find out just what is wanted. Up to Wednesday morning no decision had been reached.

One of the provisions of the law that has been much mentioned in the course of the controversy has been that forbidding the storage of films in buildings within fifty feet of a theater. As the center of the film industry is in the heart of the theatrical district, the particular provision bears with hardship on practically every structure where film companies are situated in groups.

RUMORED STUDIO DEAL.

Negotiations are said to be pending between the New York Motion Picture Corporation and the Willat Studio Company for the purchase of the latter company's new studio plant at Fort Lee, N. J. It is said that the New York Motion Picture Corporation desires the big Willat plant for the purpose of making pictures in the East, a move that has been contemplated for some time. Asked regarding the proposed deal the principals of either company refused to either affirm or deny the rumor.

MARIE DRESSLER PICTURE SOLD TO ALCO.

The suit brought by Marie Dressler to gain control of "Tillie's Punctured Nightmare," a multiple reel comedy made by the New York Motion Picture Corporation, has been dismissed by Justice Newburger in the Supreme Court, who held that he believed the picture was in good hands and that Miss Dressler's interests were fully protected.

Since that decision was rendered the New York Motion Picture Corporation sold the picture to the Alco Film Corporation for the sum of $100,000. The Alco will handle the subject for the United States and Canada.

WORLD FILM GETS CALIF. M. P. CORP. PRODUCT.

Arrangements have been made by which the California Motion Picture Corporation will market its pictures through the World Film Corporation. The first release of this company's product will be "Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch," a five-part production based upon the novel by Alice Hegan Rice. Jan. 4 is the release date. On Jan. 18 "Mignon" with a prologue and four parts will be released. This will be followed by "The Lily of Poverty Flats," based on a poem by Bret Harte. "Salvation Nell," from a play by Edward Sheldon, and "The Price She Paid," David Graham Phillips' story, are in preparation.

New Pathe-Hearst Serial

"Exploits of Elaine" to Be the Title—Charles L. Goddard and Arthur B. Reeve the Authors—First Release Dec. 28.

THE combination between the Hearst Newspapers and Pathe, which made possible "The Perils of Pauline," will be continued in a big new serial to be called "The Exploits of Elaine." Unlike "The Perils of Pauline," this new serial will be released in about fourteen weekly episodes of two reels each, the first installment to be released probably on Monday, December 28.

Charles L. Goddard, the well-known playwright, who is the author of "The Perils of Pauline," will write the new serial in collaboration with Arthur B. Reeve, author of the "Craig Kennedy" stories which have been running in the Cosmopolitan magazine for four years. Mr. Reeve is a new comer in the motion picture business and brings to his work a world-wide reputation for remarkable talent in introducing the most modern scientific knowledge and methods into detective stories. A graduate in science of Princeton University, he afterwards specialized in criminal law at the New York Law School, thus getting the ground work for the stories which he has since written. His character, "Craig Kennedy," is unique and has made Mr. Reeve famous. Under the names of "The Poisoned Pen," "The Dream Doctor" and "The Silent Bullet," these detective stories have been published yearly in book form. "Craig Kennedy" is practically the only one of the modern fiction detectives who uses real scientific methods to hunt down his criminals. William J. Burns says of "The Poisoned Pen," "I was tremendously interested in the book—I read it with a good deal of interest." The Detectaphone Company of America wrote Mr. Reeve as follows: "We feel that to 'Craig Kennedy' is due the fact that Mr. Burns has adopted the Detectaphone for all his work, at present having nearly 100 machines at the disposal of his offices." "Craig Kennedy," Mr. Reeve's famous scientific detective character, will appear in "The Exploits of Elaine."

Such an able combination in authorship will insure the very highest quality in the scenario. The cast of "The Exploits of Elaine" will be headed by Miss Pearl White, who has achieved such remarkable popularity in "The Perils of Pauline." The other principals in the cast are not yet settled upon, but it is safe to say that they will be "stars" of wide popularity and unquestioned ability.

Like "Pauline," the story of each "Exploit of Elaine" will be published in the Hearst newspapers all over the country as the corresponding picture is released. This will mean the same wide and desirable publicity which has attended "Pauline," since the Hearst newspapers have combined circulations running up into the millions.

All the art that long experience, great resources, fine equipment and splendid facilities can give will be put by Pathe into this new production. "The Perils of Pauline" has given an experience in serial making which will be invaluable, and it is safe to say that bookings on "The Exploits of Elaine" will furnish exchange men with new records to shoot at for some time to come.

COMPETITION IN FRISCO'S CHINATOWN SEVERE.

While conditions in San Francisco are steadily improving, from the standpoint of the exhibitor, and the number of five-cent houses is gradually being reduced, in some sections competition has become so keen through the erection of new houses that a deplorable condition of affairs exists. One of the large houses in a section of the city inhabited chiefly by foreigners, which shows from six to eight reels for five cents, recently commenced making a strong bid for the patronage of Chinese and to each Celestial patronizing this theater a ticket printed in Chinese was presented, this ticket being good for admission to another theater a few blocks away controlled by the same parties. A competing exhibitor learned of the scheme, after his business had commenced to fall off, and adopted a similar plan. He had no other house to which to send his patrons but gave a ticket good for admission to the same theater on another day. Thus the Chinese patrons of these houses are enabled to see from twelve to sixteen reels of pictures for five cents, while others see but one-half as many for the same price.

Quality in Biograph Multiples

The Tuesday Two-Reel Releases Show Strength in Conception and in Execution.

By George Blaisdell.

TO WATCH the consecutive showing of eleven reels of Biograph pictures is a part of a day's routine a bit out of the ordinary—and a pleasant experience as well, as the writer found on Tuesday morning. The subjects exhibited apparently were taken at random and included recent releases as well as some that have not as yet been shown to the public. Three of the productions were examples of the company's Tuesday two-reel releases, a feature of the Biograph program to which much thought and unusual care are being given by the chiefs of the "A. B." These three subjects demonstrate the capacity of the men in the Biograph studio to do things in the best way. If in connection with them there is one factor that stands out above others it must be said it is regard for the importance of the story as the foundation of the successful motion picture.

In "The Ironmaster," which was released on October 13; "On the Heights," to be put on the market on December 22, and "A Scrap of Paper," released on December 15, we have the story. We have more. We see plainly that fortifying the work of the scenario department there is a smoothly working, cohesive organization—of directors, of players, of artists and of artisans. Fondness for the classics has long been a Biograph characteristic. an examination of the titles of recent two-reel productions shows an adherence by the company to Biograph traditions. Not always is it a simple matter to restrict these subjects, many of them crammed with dramatic meat, into two thousand feet. It has been proved however, that it can be accomplished, and with most satisfying results.

The production of two-part subjects has not been marked by any diminution in the attention paid to the single-reel motion picture, to which the Biograph continued to pin its faith in days when nearly all producers were responding to the demands of exhibitors for multiple stuff. There will be released on December 28 "The House of Silence," a thousand feet in length. It is a simple story of humble persons—a man, his wife and their little daughter. Yet it tells a tale that will appeal, and appeal deeply, to men and women in any station in life in any land, for it contains in every scene heart interest—that elusive, shadowy dramatic ingredient the possession of which or the command of which spells success.

"Saved by Her Chee-ild," a half reel, to be released December 12, is a good example of burlesque. Old Lockstep is one of the characters who will make hilarity even in a Monday afternoon house. He travels on crutches; he has knees that apparently work on swivels. In his goings and comings these jointless lower legs are all over the lot. There is action aplenty in this bit—not the least of which being the bad fall sustained by a horseman when his animal takes a sudden tumble. It nearly resulted in a fatality, but the film does not reveal that phase of it. On the same reel is "Diogenes' Weekly No. 13," a burlesque on the weekly topical. The opening shows the old man coming out of a barrel armed with a lantern and what must be a motion picture camera. He "takes" all sorts of events, from Broadway to Painted Post, in Ohio. One of the more exciting is what happened to Highblower Tommy when he takes a drop too much. By a clever substitution Tommy seems to fall from a very high water tower. He is safely caught, however, and most neatly, by a pedestrian.

"Little Miss Make-Believe" is a dainty one-part comedy-drama released November 28.

"On the Heights" is a costume piece, and a strong dramatic subject; a combination for some unaccountable reason somewhat rare. It is a story of a mythical kingdom, but the illusion is firmly established. There are many fine opportunities for the players and there are fine players to take full advantage of them. Among these are Edward Cecil, who plays the king in love with Countess Irma, portrayed by Gretchen Hartman; Helen Bray, the queen; Alan Hale, a striking type for Colonel Bronnen, in love with Irma; Charles H. Mailes, A. C. Marston, Ivan Christy, J. A. Hall, and Kate Bruce, veteran Biographer. The direction, staging and costuming are notable.

Scene from "Saved by Her Chee-ild" (Biograph).

"A Scrap of Paper" is delightful comedy. It may be recalled that in it the Kendals found one of their most successful pieces. The story is told rapidly and clearly. Alan Hale has the role of Prosper, the young man who loses one sweetheart only to find another, to the eventual and eminent satisfaction of all concerned. Louise Vail is Suzanne, the woman who tries to prevent unjust suspicions on the part of her friend's husband only to become a prime factor in the fast complicating situation and to also become the happy third corner of the good triangle. Here are the other players:

Madame de Merival	Mrs. LaVarnie
Brisemouche	J. Drumier
Mathilde	Viola Smith
Louise	M. Malatesta
Anatole	William Jefferson
The Baron	Herbert Barrington
Maid	Helen Hart

"A Scrap of Paper" is an unusual picture, as a good, an exceptional, refined comedy is bound to be. It is produced with a lavish hand. The interiors are notable; and so, too, are the exteriors.

Come now to "The House of Silence." It was the morning's first subject thrown on the screen in the one-time long ago ballroom of the old Cunard mansion on Fourteenth street that, prior to removal to the Bronx, sheltered the Biograph. The house of silence is the home of the man and woman who do not speak. There has been a quarrel, the result of a bit of jealousy on the part of the husband. Later a little daughter comes to the home. The child is dumb. This fact so preys on the mind of the man he forces the wife from the home. In a deaf and dumb institution, where she seeks and obtains employment in the faint hope that she may somehow learn something of benefit to her child, she is told by the doctor in charge that if her child can hear it may be taught to talk. She kidnaps her daughter. Through the ministrations of the medical man speech is given to the little one.

Back in the humble cabin the father is on the verge of dementia through brooding. One day, when he is sitting dejectedly amid the relics of happier days, an old doll in his arms, a child, his child, enters the door and speaks to him. He embraces it. The little one goes to the door and leads in her mother. That's all.

Augusta Anderson is the wife. Alfred Paget is the husband. Katherine Lee is the child. Miss Anderson and Mr. Paget do splendid work; but watch for the picture and note the touch Katherine adds to it.

BIARMER ON TOUR FOR MINA FILMS.

O. W. Biarmer left on Friday, Nov. 27, for an extended tour of the country in the interests of MinA Films. Mr. Biarmer took with him samples of the first six "MinA" releases, the first of which, "The Thrilling Adventures of Count Verace" is to be made on December 17th through the General Film Company and other licensed exchanges.

Mr. Biarmer plans to visit every important distributing center in the United States and Canada, and to show the MinA Films to exhibitors as well as exchange men. "We've got the goods to show," said Mr. Biarmer when interviewed by a World representative just prior to his departure. MinA Films are something new in the way of one-reel comedies. They have a merit which is more than the mere talk of professional booster, and the surest way to prove this fact is to show the finished product on the screen. MinA Films will speak most convincingly for themselves and you know that pictures must be pretty fine to begin with when a manufacturer is so eager to show them before their bookings."

Mr. Biarmer will visit the following cities in the order named, with a further itinerary to be arranged later, as the western and middle states are already being canvassed in a similar manner by two other MinA prestige creators: Albany, Montreal, Toronto, Buffalo, Wilkesbarre, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington.

APEX PROGRAM IN CLEVELAND AND INDIANAPOLIS.

In response to the demand for a weekly program of Apex features in Ohio, Indiana, and Kentucky, the Apex Film Company have established offices in Cleveland and Indianapolis, under the management of Burton Garrett, who will make his headquarters in the Cleveland office. J. C. Mack will have charge of the Indianapolis office, and will not only book the regular weekly releases of the Apex program, but also the Strand features, as well as the De Luxe Attractions, including Madge Lessing in "The Blue Mouse." "Sealed Orders" will also be booked for Michigan from the Cleveland office.

ZENITH REPORTS REVIVAL.

The Zenith Feature Film Co., of Duluth, which handles the Alliance Programme in Minnesota, Wisconsin and North and South Dakota, in a recent communication states that the film people are experiencing a revival of business in his territory. J. F. Cubberly, who was one of the pioneer picture men in the Northwest, is managing head of the Duluth concern and under his generalship the Zenith has become a big factor in that section of the country. Mr. Cubberly's success has been due to his system of keeping in intimate touch with his clients; studying the needs of each and giving his advice and counsel to all who ask it.

"The Rose of the Rancho"

Belasco Production of Old California Days Picturized by Lasky in Five Reels.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

THERE could hardly be a more prettily romantic story than that of which "The Rose of the Rancho" is the heroine. It is set in fertile lower California just after that country had been ceded to the United States by conquered Mexico and the story turns on the reluctance of the proud hidalgos to register the boundaries of their great land holdings with the new "Gringo" government. The failure to register left the owner at the mercy of brutal claim jumpers, who would come in the middle of the night, break in and, after living a night of devastation too horrible to dwell upon, would register as owners and legally possess the land. The hero of the story is an American sent from Washington to put a stop to the practice. Up to the close of the story it is nip and tuck whether he will be able to save the ranch and the life of the "Rose" whom he loves.

The stage version of the story, with its life and color was a most pleasing spectacle. Yet because of the story, because of good acting, especially on the part of the very personable heroine (Bessie Barriscale) and because of the charm of the actual California backgrounds, the offering is, as a picture, a decided success. It is a bit awkward, and cramped by suggestions of stage limitations—this is what keeps it from unqualified triumph. It was plain that the Strand audience liked it from remarks overheard.

The one advantage the picture has over the stage version is the actual views of California that serve it as backgrounds. It also makes certain parts of the story clear that the play merely hinted at. We have criticised the picture, but let us, in closing, emphatically register this fact that the offering as it stands is far too pretty in all ways and too thoroughly diverting to be anything but an emphatic success.

KLEINE ATTRACTIONS BRING SUCCESS.

The Boston Opera House, rendezvous of effete Boston, is doing extraordinary things with the entire line of George Kleine Attractions. Opening October 19 with "For Napoleon and France," the Opera House has played an unbroken series of Kleine successes, including "Antony and Cleopatra," "Spartacus," "The Lion of Venice" and "Julius Caesar." The matinees are daily attended by the best society in Boston which has turned much of its Grand Opera enthusiasm to pictures.

DOMAN JOINS UNIVERSAL PUBLICITY STAFF.

R. S. Doman, recently with Philip Mindil, "the man who found press agentry a trade and raised it to an exact science," and before that on the staff of the Mutual Film Corporation's house organs, "Reel Life" and "Our Mutual Girl Weekly," has joined Paul Gulick in the Universal Press Department, succeeding Harvey Gates as associate editor of the Universal Weekly. Doman and "Rufe" Gaynor, son of the late Mayor, conducted the Evening Sun motion-picture section two years ago.

PATHE GETTING FINE WAR PICTURES.

The statement has been widely circulated that genuine war pictures are impossible to get, that mobilization maneuvers and libraries furnish practically all of the war news in films. That this is contrary to the truth is proven every week in the Pathe projection room in Jersey City when the newly arrived negatives are shown. Some of the battlefield views are so horrible that it is imposible to make use of them. Piles of unburied, dead ready to be cremated, long burial trenches filled with the mangled remains of what once were men, and tangled heaps of the human flotsam and jetsam of the conflict are all shown. Such realism is, of course, unadapted for public showing.

War pictures are, it is true, very difficult to get, but not so much so as in the early days of the war. It is interesting to note that owing to the absence of most able bodied Frenchmen on the firing line that Pathe has been driven to the necessity of using women as cameramen. The sight of these Pathe "camerawomen," trudging along with camera and helper, has become a fairly common sight in Paris. It is reported that they have proven themselves quick to learn, reliable and competent and certainly those who accompany the army for the Pathe News have shown plenty of nerve as well. In several instances they have been able to get to places where cameramen were not allowed, which goes to show that human nature is the same everywhere, and that a pretty feminine face and pleasant smile have a wonderful potency in overcoming difficulties.

"The Sisters"

A Spirit-Stirring Two-Reel Majestic, Featuring Lillian and Dorothy Gish.

W. CHRISTY CABANNE has produced in "The Sisters," a photo story which pervades and tempers by rousing the affections, and tremendous contributory influence is the acting of both Gish sisters. The play's structural simplicity is deceptive, possibly because its clear directness of narration seems incomparable with what is commonly known as "plot." Its form is unaffected; there is an absence of theatrical tradition in its presentation; its people do ordinary things in no extraordinary way, and it is because of their attitude towards life that they fit so appropriately in the general scheme. That general scheme is to present an affecting phase of life with intense realism.

It is scarcely necessary to feature the Gish sisters—they feature themselves. From very simple materials they compose little melodies of their own that either brighten a picture or reach hearts with delicacy and tenderness. They have little acquired faults of gesture, small nervous movements of their hands, to convey the idea of hesitation, but their spontaneous characterization is delightful. Their revelations of thought and feeling are as clean cut as a freshly-minted coin.

A peculiarity of "The Sisters" is that its main theme is not immediately set in action. The story starts off like a "triangle" and bids fair to become a quadrangle. Dorothy, sweet country girl, has a rustic suitor when the inevitable city chap comes along. He fascinates her from the outset, but his sentiments do not warm until he meets Lillian. It is a case of natural selection for these two, and their marriage leaves Dorothy unmated with a sore spot in her heart. She finally consoles herself with the rustic suitor and becomes his faithful wife. All this preparation is interesting but its purpose does not become obvious until the sisters pass through childbirth at about the same time.

The younger sister's baby is a bouncing boy. The elder sister's child is still-born, and she sinks into a period of puerperal fever. Her condition on regaining consciousness is one of grave peril, as she calls insistently for her child and cannot be told that it is dead without endangering her frail hold on life. A general appeal is made to the younger sister to permit a temporary substitution, which means depriving her of the first joys of young motherhood. The situation is now filled with apportunity for fine acting, from the moment of the young mother's noble sacrifice to that of dramatic restitution. Not an atom of opportunity is lost. Both young artists respond with high appreciation of what is required of them in one of the sweetest plays of its kind ever shown on the screen.

Emma Clifton

ONE would think that slapstick comedy and lofty music would not go well together, but it must, for the other day while visiting the Ford Sterling studio in Hollywood, a big rough and tumble scene was being staged, while in a corner dressing room not fifty feet away the leading lady, pretty Miss Emma Clifton, was thrumming a ukulele.

I stopped in and asked her if she liked music, perhaps a foolish question, but out here in California everyone plays one of these instruments, whether they like music or not. "Certainly, music was to have been my life's work, but, unfortunately, I could not continue with my studies, and had to look elsewhere for a vocation. It was my ambition, ever since I started music in the Sisters of Mercy Convent in Philadelphia, to study music and go abroad to learn from the greatest teachers."

Emma Clifton.

This winsome comedy leading lady was born in that Pennsylvania city on the fourth of November, in the year, well, it was shortly after the world's fair in Chicago, so you can see that she is still quite a miss. Philadelphia has been her home most of the time, but New York saw her for nearly four years. She was reared in the former city and received the greater portion of her education there.

Her first appearance in films was merely an accident, and, as she says, "I went out to the Lubin studio to see my uncle, who was there, and before I left, Barry O'Neil put me in a boarding house scene, and I never will forget that picture. He used me in many other scenes thereafter, and soon I was working regularly, and, as I had to do something, this appealed to me strongly, and before long I went to Birmingham, Ala., with that company. We stayed over two months, six weeks of which it rained steadily, Christmas day and all. We left soon and came to this state, where I have been ever since."

This was in 1912 and 1913, and Miss Clifton came west with Director F. J. Grandon. Later, when the Lubin people returned to the east, she remained here and joined the Keystone forces, and when Ford Sterling left and organized his own company, she was brought over and made the leading lady, playing opposite him. In this release the vivacious Miss Clifton has played many heavy leading parts, and has been in some thrilling experiences which were really thrilling, not only in the picture, but in reality, for in one film she was so badly scratched and bruised that she had to be under the care of a doctor for some days. This was in "Secret Service Snitz," a well remembered release of the Sterling Company's. Miss Clifton will be remembered in her best picture, "Love and Vengeance," the picture featuring the Vanderbilt races at Santa Monica last year. This was also her first picture with Ford Sterling.

She says: "And you can say that I like the east better than any other part of the world; not that I do not like California, but the east is always calling me." Her father is Wallace C. Clifton, the well-known scenario writer for Selig's.

CLARKE IRVINE.

VAN LOAN ASSISTS.

Charles E. Van Loan, the author, is in Banning, California, with the Bosworth Company, assisting in the production of the feature film version of his story, "The Message to Buckshot John," which is being produced by Hobart Bosworth. In the cast are Courtney Foote, Art Accord, the famous cowboy, Karl Von Schiller, Helen Wolcott and Rhea Haines. Mr. Bosworth himself plays "Buckshot John," a remarkable character, and one which he is making a sensational success.

"Mrs Black is Back"

May Irwin, Original Screen Actress, Also Comes Back in a Story That Finishes Well.

Reviewed by George Blaisdell.

IT MUST be seventeen or eighteen years ago that followers of vaudeville were laughing over something new under the sun. It was a moving picture—the motion picture had not then been thought of—and it was entitled "The Kiss" or something very much like it. Certainly it was a kiss, a big one—limited only by the size of the screen. It is our recollection that "The Kiss" made a record for length—forty feet. The famous silent but much animated smack of May Irwin and John C. Rice—and what a string of imitators humble and mighty it has had—will be recalled by the appearance or reappearance on the screen of May Irwin in George V. Hobart's "Mrs. Black Is Back." The adaptation is in four parts.

The medium in which the old-time popular comedy star returns to the screen is in many respects a drama, especially in its introduction and development. The latter part of the story moves fast and makes much mirth. The tale is of a widow who marries a scholarly old chap who abhors a liar. The widow foolishly had permitted the professor's guess of twenty-nine years as her age to stand uncontradicted; she even conceals the age of her husky son. The falsifications accumulate until she is overwhelmed.

Scene from "Mrs. Black Is Back" (Famous Players).

Miss Irwin in her most serious and distressed moments provokes mirth. The fun is in the complicating situations. The actress has good support, especially from Charles Lane, who portrays Professor Black; Elmer Booth, who has the part of the son, and Wellington Playter, seen as Tom Larkey, the instructor in athletics. Howard Missimer makes the most of his bit as the valet.

Mr. Lane gives a fine performance. Mr. Booth, long-time picture player with Biograph training, made one of the hits of the piece. His interpretation of the debt-incurring son who insists on coming home to mother, in spite of her protests, is most amusing. The best comedy situations are where his mother has hurriedly transformed him into the family cook.

The picture will interest, for its intrinsic qualities as well as for the bringing back to us of the noted funmaker. She has not forgotten in her well-earned retirement and her wealth how to entertain.

BERANGER DIRECTING FOR MAJESTIC.

Geo. A. Beranger, who has ben acting as assistant director to Mr. D. W. Griffith for almost a year, branched out as a full-fledged director this week, and is producing "The Baby's Ride" for the Majestic company. The plot deals with the experience of a two-year-old baby, whom the parents think has been kidnapped by tramps. They are agreeably surprised to find that the youngster has accidentally been picked up in a bundle of carpet, and is enjoying himself with a crowd of children when they find him. Wallace Reid and Loretta Blake are featured in "The Baby's Ride," which will be a Majestic release as part of the Mutual program.

Dorothy Granville

MISS DOROTHY GRANVILLE, for years a featured player in stellar New York and Chicago productions, being associated with the Liebler Company, Bernard Granville, Alexander Carr, Jack Kohl, Kolb & Dill, Harry Askin, Mort Singer and other notables in the theatrical world, has signed a contract with the Balboa Amusement Producing Company of Long Beach, California, and will be leading woman of one of the corporation's dramatic companies, her debut as a cinema star to be attended by a large outlay of money on a feature drama in which she will be supported by a group of twenty players.

Dorothy Granville.

Miss Granville was born in San Francisco, June 10, 1892, of English parentage, her grandfather being John Ford, founder of three churches in Hereford, England. After receiving school education in San Francisco, she was for two years a student in Wellesley College in Massachusetts. She began her stage career by joining the Alcazar Theater stock company in San Francisco, remaining there many months as ingenue and character player, later becoming a member of the Kolb & Dill company at Fischer's Theater in San Francisco. Her next engagement was with the Mort Singer Company, presenting "His Highness, The Bey," at the La Salle Theater in Chicago, and subsequently she was featured in a vaudeville act owned by Jack Kohl. The Lieblers then engaged her for a road tour in "Marriage a la Carte," the organization playing long periods in New York, Chicago, Philadelphia and other cities. During all of the next year she enacted the role of Gladys in "Louisiana Lou" at the La Salle Theater, under the management of Harry Askin.

For many months she and Bernard Granville presented a skit, "In Lovers' Lane" over the Keith and Orpheum circuits, enacting character impersonations. Later she had long engagements as a vaudeville star appearing alone in a headline feature. She is a niece of Granville Barker, the famous actor-playwright, of London, England.

DIRECTOR FRANCE STOOD BREATHLESS?

Realizing that one wrong step would perhaps result in serious injury, Director France stood breathless while Gladys Hulette was being carried across a narrow ledge which overhung a gorge, two hundred feet deep. The Edison ingenue showed not the slightest sign of fear, but was willing, if necessary, to repeat the perilous task.

"SHERIFF" MACKLEY IN RELIANCE DRAMA.

"Sheriff" Arthur Mackley again appears in characteristic western garb in the thrilling Reliance drama of western life—"A Lucky Disappointment," written by George Hennessy. In this picture is told a graphic story of an irate father who strenuously objects to the attentions bestowed upon his daughter by a suitor, to whom he has taken an evident dislike. When this suitor is instrumental in saving the lives of the father and daughter from a pair of highwaymen, and incidentally prevents the father from losing his entire fortune, the old man relents and consents to the marriage. "Sheriff" Mackley, aside from directing the production, also appears in the role of one of the western highwaymen. The cast includes Baldy Belmont, Florence Crawford and Elmer Clifton.

"The Silent Witness"

Villain Tries to Steal Telephone That Gives Both Sight and Sound; But It Witnesses Against Him—Three-Reel Pathe.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

THE story told by this three-reel Pathe picture is very fair and, on all other counts, acting, photography and beauty of backgrounds, the offering is above the average. One thing much in its favor is its showing actually at work a new invention, the telephote, which will give a clear picture of the person talking through the telephone at the other end of the wire. The apparatus used is quite elaborate; one would think that some inventor at work on the very problem had loaned his material and, of course, by trick camera manipulation it is made to work perfectly. There is a good deal of interest attached to it; for the telephote, not yet perfected, is still the dream of many inventors and it is good in the picture, because it is a thing that has excited popular imagination.

The melodramatic story is good enough to serve its purpose, although built according to an old time formula. It is excellently acted. The players tone down the rough parts and make the spectator quickly forget the film's few impossible things. Some wonderful views of the Pyrenees are included, and, throughout, both interior and exterior scenes have been photographed with life-like clearness and toned in soft greys that are often most attractive. The inventor has shown his telephote to a capitalist who is enthusiastic. The rich man's daughter seems to have taken a great liking for the inventor much to the displeasure of her cousin, a roue in debt, who wants to marry her for her fortune. He fixes things so that the capitalist thinks the inventor a thief and disgraces him. The rich man dies and the villain tries to counterfeit the invention. The inventor is warned and gets a job in the works in disguise. He sets up the real apparatus in the girl's home and later, taking down the receiver at his end, sees the villain abducting the girl. There's a chase through the Pyrenees. The villain has captured the hero and sets him and the girl in a limousine going down the mountain with no one at the wheel; but doesn't know that the hero's brother has rescued them. Then comes the final scene which is pictured with this review and in which the villain gives himself away by his astonishment at seeing the hero alive. We count it a very fair offering.

O. R. HENKEL JOINS PROGRESSIVES.

O. R. Henkel, formerly manager of the La Salle Opera House, and who afterward opened up the Northwest branch for George Kleine in Seattle, Wash., has resigned and gone over with the Progressive Motion Picture Company in the capacity of special representative of Western Canada, including the provinces of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba. Among the features he will handle in the provinces are Jack London's "Sea Wolf," "The Valley of the Moon," "Martin Eden," "Les Miserables," "The House of Temberley" and "Hearts of Oak." Mr. Henkel's many years' experience ahead of important theatrical attractions place him in a position to establish new records in the Northwest. He will work in conjunction with the Seattle office of the Progressive Company.

Lillian Russell in "Wildfire"

LILLIAN RUSSELL is one of the best known women before the public today. She holds a unique position in the esteem of the nation. For years she has been a leader of the stage and as a beauty her fame has been of such long duration that men who are now grandfathers can remember the time when they as college students eagerly looked forward to seeing Lillian Russell in her wonderful comic opera successes of days past.

Lillian Russell.

At the Fort Lee Studios of the World Film Corporation, she is now working on a moving picture version of her greatest stage success, "Wildfire," the play that was written especially for her by George Broadhurst and George V. Hobart. When the play was originally produced by Joseph Brooks, in Cincinnati, the audience at the opening night were a bit disconcerted because they had come prepared to see a musical play but saw nothing of the sort in "Wildfire." She was acting a character and she made the audience realize that she was an actress of distinction. They were not disappointed when the final curtain fell. That first performance marked her entrance into the legitimate stage. The packed audience in Cincinnati was the forerunner of a long series of similar audiences that gathered wherever Lillian Russell in "Wildfire" was announced. When her tour was completed Miss Russell decided to retire to private life but she received so many requests from her admirers all over the United States and Canada who were anxious to see her in "Wildfire" that she was receptive to the idea of making a motion picture from the play when that plan was suggested to her by General Manager Lewis J. Selznick of the World Film Corporation. To him is due the credit of placing Miss Russell under contract and her legions of admirers will welcome the opportunity of seeing her again.

Edwin Middelton is in charge of the production which is to be released in the regular World Film Corporation program, January 11th. This is to be one of the trump features in that service and General Manager Selznick is certain that "Wildfire" will set a new record for high grade star features.

DOUGHERTY SCOUTING AROUND.

Russell K. Dougherty, director in the Kinetophote Corporation, is in Boston this week looking over the field there and incidentally to attend the exhibitor's ball in the interests of the Kinetophote. Mr. Dougherty had just returned from a trip to Chicago where he inspected the new K. C. Booking Company's offices in the Mallers Building. He came back enthusiastic over the reception which features are getting in the West. Mr. Dougherty believes that features will have a tremendous vogue, especially in the middle west, for some time to come.

WOODS WRITES "RAYS OF SUNSHINE."

Frank E. Woods, scenario manager for the Reliance and Majestic, has just completed writing the scenario for "Rays of Sunshine," a two-reel Majestic drama, dealing with the career of an ex-convict, who has been railroaded to prison on a framed-up charge.

Director Jack O'Brien is staging it, with Mary Alden being featured, assisted by Jack Conway and Spottiswoode Aitken. The ex-convict is forced by an adventuress to rob his employer's home. He revolts at the last moment, and this incident furnishes one of the most thrilling climaxes that could possibly be devised for motion pictures.

"Damon and Pythias"

Six Reels—Universal Film Co.

THE most attractive part of this feature is the beauty of its theme—the delineation of an heroic friendship the record of which has come down to us through the ages and has furnished forth the inspiration of painter, sculptor and writer. The producer has made an earnest, I might say a determined, effort to rise to the "heights of this argument" and at times one feels that the effort has not been entirely in vain. Many of the exterior settings have been well chosen, in the matter of costumes and even of architecture there is much that is worthy of praise. The actors taking the leading parts were William Worthington (Damon) and Herbert Rawlinson (Pythias). They strove hard to do justice to their respective parts. Frank Lloyd, as Dionysius, the tyrant of Syracuse, was equally conscientious and the same may be said of the women's parts, which are perhaps of minor importance. The acting of the wife of Damon in the scene with her little son was admirable.

The drama itself is preceded by a series of scenic views showing the Acropolis at a distance and close by the Temple of Vulcan, the Parthenon and the temple, as well as statues of Pallas Athene, the tutelary Goddess of the Attic Capital. The scenic views close with a view of the sun setting over the hill of the Acropolis. The introduction is well suited to the theme which tells of a story of ancient Greece.

The opening scene of the play is very pretty, conveying not without skill the idea of friendship between Damon and

Scene from "Damon and Pythias" (Universal).

Pythias. We learn in the early part of the film that Damon and Pythias have ties that are often held to be closer even than the ties of friendship—Damon is a husband and father, Pythias is betrothed to a woman who has won his heart. The scenario cleverly emphasizes the existence and even the strength of these other claims, thus ensuring the powerful climax of the Damon and Pythias tradition. Pythias wins renown as a warrior, Damon is devoted to the cause of civic freedom. A member of the senate of Syracuse and a lover of free institutions, Damon views with alarm the ambitious designs of Dionysius and opposes the plans of the latter to have himself crowned the monarch of the city. The film here follows the legend with great fidelity. In his ardor for liberty Damon seeks to kill Dionysius. The majority of the servile senate support the ambitions of the tyrant and Damon is condemned to death. Pythias; who has returned a popular hero from the field of battle and is now enjoying the sweet companionship of his betrothed, the lovely Callanthe, hears of the sorry plight of Damon and struggling out of the fond embraces of his sweetheart he hastens to the aid of his friend. Arriving at the palace of the tyrant he finds Damon in chains. Damon is resigned to his fate, but cherishes a last wish; he wants to bid farewell to his wife and son. Pythias insists on becoming his hostage and the tyrant allows Damon from noon to sunset to pay a last visit to his home. Here the writer of the scenario has added some strength to the story by showing the temptations to which Pythias was subjected while in prison waiting for the return of Damon. This departure from the old versions was a happy idea and makes the whole last reel much stronger. The disguise of the tyrant who wanted to test the friendship of the two men was another clever device and considerably heightened the effect of the scene upon the public square when Pythias is led out for execution.

There are some spots in this feature that the public, which has become critical concerning the productions dealing with great classical subjects, may feel to be inadequate. For example, the trireme, the classic watercraft, cannot be properly imitated by using a boat of obviously modern construction placed at a good distance from the audience. Much the same holds true of the senate chamber. There is a chariot race which is good. The authors of the scenario have shown unmistakable evidence of skill in dramatic construction.

The film is being shown in the New York theater, where the opening performance occurred on Monday November 23. High officials of the Order of the Knights of Pythias attended the opening and delivered speeches in which they expressed their admiration of the way in which the subject had been handled by the Universal Film Company.

"JULIUS CAESAR" AT THE CUMBERLAND.

Turnaway crowds marked the amount of business done on November 29 and 30 when Francis A. Mangan, manager of the Cumberland Theater, Cumberland street and Greene avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y., played George Kleine's big six-part picture entitled "Julius Caesar." This is another indication that the public's interest in big historical and biographical subjects is on the increase. To emphasize the Roman atmosphere of the picture, Manager Mangan added some features which savored of the time the action of the picture is supposed to have taken place. In the singers' balcony, which is to the right of the screen, Mr. Mangan had a brasier with incense burning, the fumes of which pervaded the entire auditorium. Big, expensive rugs of antique design were draped in and about the box, the color of which harmonized with the general color scheme of the auditorium. The wall below the stage was decorated with trellis work, and a silk banner resembling the front part of Caesar's throne with the letters S. P. Q. R. thereon was hung over the lattice work. The same kind of banner also adorned the lower part of the singers' box and other sections of the interior.

After the film introduction of the leading characters in the picture, Manager Mangan had a herald dressed in Roman costume appear in the singers' balcony and blow three resounding blasts from a trumpet. That was the announcement for the starting of the picture proper. Suitable musical numbers were played. Appropriate parts from the operas "Tannhauser" and "Aida," and the piece "The March of the Gladiators" were rendered at the proper time. Consistent bars from other operatic selections also formed a part of the melody. Judged as a whole, the business done and the way the picture was presented is a credit to Manager Mangan. The admission prices were 10 and 15 cents.

"FORTUNES OF WAR" FEATURES CHARLES RAY.

Without wig and grease paint, Charles Ray, the Inceville leading man, is seen almost as he is in private life in "The Fortunes of War," a Mexican military production soon to be released by Thomas H. Ince. Ray plays the part of a young American, about whose love for a beautiful Mexican senorita, the story is woven. Enid Markey plays opposite Ray. The production was directed by Jay Hunt.

"Thais"

Four-Part Adaptation of Anatole France's Novel by Arthur Maude Contains Notable Backgrounds and Photography.

THERE is being released from the offices of Sawyer a four-part dramatization by Arthur Maude of "Thais," the novel of Anatole France. The subject was produced by Loftus Features, under the personal direction of Mr. Maude and Constance Crawley. The picture was put on in Southern California, which means that the photography has the sharp quality of that section. The backgrounds peculiarly lend themselves to the period of the story. They have been selected with an eye to their artistic value and their picturesqueness.

Constance Crawley plays the role of Thais, the courtesan. Miss Crawley is effective in her love-making scenes; she plays her part, which is, of course, that of a conscienceless woman, bartering her affections or what may represent them for a ring or other matter or thing of material value. She is best in the later situations, in the scenes leading up to and following her entry into the convent.

Mr. Maude has the part of Paphnuce, the young noble who after he discovers the character of the woman with whom he has fallen in love, assumes the garb of a monk and takes up the life of a hermit. Mr. Maude is impressive in his work, which is characterized by fervor and deep feeling. George Gebhardt is Nicais, the brother of Paphnuce, who is for so long the favorite of Thais and who eventually is thrown over through the love of the woman for the man she had earlier spurned. Mr. Gebhardt gives a strong performance; he makes of Nicais the antithesis of Paphnuce. Where the brother is staid and slow-moving, he is alert, fiery and full of the joy of life, always ready to defend with physical force the possession of the woman who has captivated him.

There is a large cast. It is in evidence mostly in the scenes of revelry. The story as a whole is confined to the four or five principals. We have referred to the notable settings. There are both gardens and seashore. Some of the latter are highly picturesque. "Thais" will please the eye even if it fail measurably to stir the heart.

MAKING DEALS FOR BALBOA.

E. D. Horkheimer, secretary-treasurer of the Balboa Amusement Production Company, of Long Beach, California, is in New York, bringing with him 40,000 feet of negative and positive film. While in the city he will arrange for further exploitation of the Balboa Company's new prize contest for spectators of moving picture shows, by which tournament $1,000 will be paid in awards to the persons who write the best letters answering the query, Who Pays?, the missives to solve the twelve questions asked in a dozen dramas which show vital problems of life. During his stay in New York, Mr. Horkheimer will confer with Henry Pessers, a director of Bishop, Pessers & Co., Ltd., of London, and arrange several film-marketing deals for districts in Europe. The English film firm will renew its contract in handling Balboa Feature Films in Great Britain, with an additional agreement to market the Balboa pictures in India, South Africa, Australia and other foreign countries.

August and Terriss Join Forces

EDWIN AUGUST and Tom Terriss have joined forces with the Kinetophote. They have already begun to cast for the first of a series of photoplays taken from famous plays which each will produce and appear in for the Kinetophote. The arrangements between Mr. Terriss and Mr. August and the Kinetophote were made complete this week and each of these sterling screen players has established himself in the offices of the corporation, at 126-132 West 46th street.

Edwin August.

Mr. August has arranged to take up at once work on one of two popular novels the rights of which have been bought by the Kinetophote. He will work with the author of the one selected as the first feature which he will produce and will closely follow the original ideas regarding the characters. Each member of the cast will therefore, be carefully selected as to looks and ability for the particular role which he is to play.

Mr. Terriss will produce and star in the famous Terriss plays made noteworthy not only by his father, the great English actor, but by himself as well.

Tom Terriss.

The rise which Edwin August has had in pictures has been steady from the time he played leads with Mary Pickford and Blanche Sweet in the old Biograph days. In addition to writing and producing, Mr. August has been the star in many of the screen dramas which have been made by him.

Mr. Terriss has been well known to the American public for years as well as to the English public. His work on the stage, especially in the characters from the works of Charles Dickens, has been praised from one end of the world to the other. And since he has become identified with the "silent drama" of the pictures his activities have been so distinctive that he has made an enviable name for himself in the newest of dramatic arts.

EDDIE LYONS DIRECTOR OF NEW NESTOR CO.

Eddie Lyons, formerly leading man in Al Christie's Nestor company, has been made principal director of a second Nestor comedy company which is to work in conjunction with the original company. Miss "Billie" Rhodes, long known in the Pacific coast colony as an exceptionally clever character lead and comedienne, has been secured to play the leading feminine roles in Mr. Lyons' forthcoming comedies. Jack Dillon has been engaged to play opposite her.

Mr. Christie will continue to exercise general supervision of both the new and old Nestor comedy companies and about once or twice a month the two companies will be combined so that the old Ford-Lyons-Moran combination can work together.

"Center of the Web"

A Two-Part Thanhouser, Showing the Intelligent Action of Police Dogs.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

CAST:

Ida Dean.....Claire Crowell
John Linton.....Frank Wood
George Morley.....George Nilblack.

THAT part of the cast not mentioned in "Center of the Web," the four-footed detectives employed in tracing a gang of counterfeiters, will probably make a hit with the average motion-picture audience. They play their roles with a spontaneity and enthusiasm that is far from theatrical and just that much more delightful. Their action is admirably timed, and is spirited throughout the period in which they are shown. The story is commonplace and almost destitute of that genuine requisite of success—characterization. Claire Crowell stands almost alone in this respect, possibly through her strong and attractive personality. The men do all that is required of them and do it well—the fault is one of play structure, and it is a common fault in many five-reel adaptations from stage plays.

Some attempt is made to present the leads in a manner that will enable the audience to recognize them in swift action and follow their movements. We can separate the chief counterfeiter from the society crook, and both from the young detective bent on capturing the gang, but the presentation of many other characters, quite often en masse, leads to temporary confusion and consequent lapse of interest in the story. There are entirely too many characters shown where they are not actually required—they interfere with that differentiation which enables a spectator to fasten attention on the leads. When most of the action falls to subordinates and still others are introduced to show how the gang manages to "push the queer" through innocent people, the main lure of interest is abandoned and the detective's achievements nullified by dependence on mere luck. The charm of continuity is broken and levity of action replaced by intervention of the unnecessary, the injection of a side issue. Out of it all is finally evolved, through the spirited struggle of Miss Ida Dean, her preservation of the young detective's life, though no logical reason is given why it should be spared for such a purpose. Arbitrary and artificial scenes in detective stories have seen their day.

Now come the dogs. The detective's prolonged absence leads to the use of police dogs, and the chase following their discovery of the counterfeiter's den is remarkable in many respects. They spring through windows, even through a single pane, over transoms at a bound and out of second-story windows with cat-like agility. They leap into lofts; they mount haystacks; they even climb trees. Without the savagery shown by French police dogs in tackling a criminal, they are relentless in pursuit and finally round-up all the counterfeiters, and the play ends with a sentence passed upon all but the girl who saved the detective. The dogs enliven the picture every moment they are in evidence and count heavily in giving value to the release.

"Ambition"

Rex Three-Reel Drama Featuring Ben Wilson and Frances Nelson Exceptionally Well Done.

Reviewed by the Rev. E. Boudinot Stockton, S.T.B.

THE theme of this picture is the old one of the wife who learns the folly of ambition only when she has wrecked her home and lost her child and who regains her happiness by the self-sacrifice of the good woman with the selfless love. Its attractiveness, which is very great, lies in the natural way in which the story has been developed and in the "human-being-ness" of the characters and their actions. As we look at the picture we seem to be looking at the story of the everyday life and people that we rub shoulders with every day. This is due partly to the naturalness and human and heart interest of the story, but also in a great measure to the work of the actors whose painstaking work and ability have most successfully sunk their personalities in the characters they are impersonating and whom they bring vividly and interestingly before us as real persons of flesh and blood.

The attempt to bring about the regulation "happy ending" to the story is not as sucessful as it might have been, but the close is pathetic rather than unhappy. Our sympathies are not so much with the rather shallow minded and suddenly repentant wife who regains in a moment a loving husband and home, but with the true and loving friend of the husband who has stood faithfully by him during all his trouble and suffering and is finally allowed to go out of his life at the end unrequited and unrewarded. This is true to life where there is always the hope of the hereafter, but it is not true to fiction or photoplay where the end of the story or the picture is the end of everything.

CRANE WILBUR LEAVES PATHE.

Crane Wilbur, for several years the representative male star of the Pathe American Company, and for the last year exploited as the hero in "The Perils of Pauline," has left the employ of Pathe Freres and is at present considering the offers of several prominent film manufacturers who would like to add his name to their list of stars. Mr. Wilbur severs his business relations with Pathe Freres with the kindest of feelings. His contract with the company has terminated with the last installment of "Pauline," which is now completed. Crane Wilbur has been with Pathe Freres nearly four years, never having appeared in pictures under the direction of any other company. It was in their releases that he gained his reputation and nation-wide popularity.

JESSE LASKY ENGAGES HARRY WOODRUFF.

Samuel Goldfish announces that Harry Woodruff, the distinguished Broadway favorite, has been engaged by the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company, to appear in the forthcoming screen version of "A Gentleman of Leisure," a comedy drama that had a decided success on Broadway about two years ago. It was written by Joseph Stapleton. The story concerns the adventures of a well-to-do young man who makes a wager that he can commit a burglary and return to his own house without being detected. The young man, accompanied by a professional housebreaker, makes the attempt and wins his wager after a series of very entertaining escapades. A selected company of the cleverest Lasky players will support Mr. Woodruff.

"Her Escape"

A Character So Villainous That Blinded, He Is Still a Menace in a Two-Reel Rex Picture.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

THE foundation of every dramatic situation is character and, generally speaking, the characters of two or more people. The action in this two-reel picture, produced by Joseph De Grasse and written by Lon Chaney, springs from a man who is a type of the Anglo-Saxon at his worst—the best and the worst come from our race. He is a man who is at once strong and villainous and ugly. Opposite to him is a girl. The man is played by Lon Chaney, the author, and his character dominates the story. He had been the pal and partner in all kinds of villainy of the girl's father who in the opening scenes of the picture is killed by falling down stairs while drunk—chasing his daughter with a chair. The girl is played by Pauline Bush. She has escaped from her father when he dies and takes good care to keep out of the way of the young partner. She had always hated to pilfer and steal for her precious relative and his pal and now she thinks that she can live an upright life.

If she had been a bit more hard hearted, she would have been quite safe; for the young scoundrel is blinded. She is married to a doctor and is happy. The blind man comes to her with the deepest villainy in his heart; but asking pity for his blind eyes. She and her husband take him in. Blind as he is he is still full of harm and she has a dramatic escape from him. The picture tells its story pretty well and its big situation is certainly striking. The spirit of it is not of the highest; although there is nothing vulgar about it. The producer has made his story effective by the speed of its action rather than by that quiet, relentless development showing in the acting and in the exits and entrances that he has taken time to think out what at any moment is best and not taken what is second best. Here we find the best possible action broken now and then by what is palpably second best, if not weaker. It is an unusual picture. It will surely "go" well and makes a very fair offering.

SOME "CLASS" TO THIS MOB.

In staging "His Lesson," Donald Crisp, of the Majestic, had an all-star cast in one of his mob scenes. In order to lose no time in completing the picture, Crisp had his entire company working at the studio Sunday morning. He had to use a mob scene, and there were no extra players on hand. Directors Eddie Dillon, W. C. Cabanne, Jack O'Brien and Fred Kelsey were also working this Sunday. Crisp sent out an emergency call, and all the available people about the studio were pressed into service as part of the mob.

The Gish sisters, Lillian and Dorothy, Irene Hunt, Fay Tincher, Jack Conway, Mae Marsh, and other players, together with all the directors, assistant directors and camera men, were pressed into service in the mob scene. Frank E. Woods, scenario manager, was also utilized, and led the cheering in the mob scene, where one of the politicians was making a speech. Billy Bitzner, Director Griffith's star camera man, acted before a camera for the first time, and was cautioned by Director Crisp several times to refrain from looking at the camera.

Ethel Grandin

MISS ETHEL GRANDIN, until recently leading woman of the Universal-Imp Company and Ray C. Smallwood, who was directing the pictures in which she appeared, have both become affiliated with the Smallwood Film Corporation.

This company will release two one-reel subjects a week to Warner's Features through the United program. Miss Grandin will have one release a week under the brand name of Grandin Films. The second release will be a farce comedy, the brand name of which has not as yet been selected.

Ethel Grandin.

The first Grandin release on the United program will be "The Adopted Daughter," a three-part photoplay featuring Ethel Grandin in a dual character, which will be released December 14, 1914.

Although only twenty years of age, Miss Grandin has been prominently featured with the Imp Company, the New York Motion Picture Company and the Universal Film Manufacturing Company for a period of four years. She will be particularly remembered as having played the leading female role in "Traffic in Souls."

Before taking up motion picture work, Miss Grandin was on the legitimate stage, having been with Chauncey Olcott two seasons and with Joseph Jefferson the same length of time. For a year prior to her motion picture engagement, she was featured in a vaudeville sketch playing the Orpheum and United time.

WARNING TO PIRATES.

The Jacobs Film Company, Manhattan Building, Milwaukee, Wis., which is booking the Apex releases in Wisconsin for the Casino Feature Film Co., of Detroit, requests Wisconsin exhibitors to notify them immediately, any person or persons seeking to book the three-reel Apex feature, "Called to the Front." It has come to the company's notice that certain people are booking this picture without authority. W. A. Baier, manager of the Jacobs Film Company, states that any person or persons found booking this picture in the State of Wisconsin without authority will be prosecuted.

TICKER EXPERT IN "SAMSON."

Geo. Gilbert, known on Wall Street as the "King of the Brass Pounders," was especially engaged by the Box Office Attraction Co. to operate the "price-mill" in the big scene of the firm's production of "Samson," Henri Bernstein's great drama of love and intrigue, filmed as a production extraordinary. George has been roaming round loose since the war gave Money Lane such a jolt.

In the scene where George contributes his mite to the grand effect, Maurice Barchard, the financial Samson of France, is crushing his enemy, Govain, by remorselessly driving down the copper market, even though his own ruin is involved. Brachard, played by William Farnum, the famous actor, smiles grimly as the tape tells of the downward rush of copper. Director Edgar Lewis, who is a bear for realism, was not satisfied with any ordinary stage means of driving the tape through the ticker. He wanted the utmost verisimilitude in the scene and to have accurate market signs and symbols recorded on the tape. A key and electrical connections were rigged up; but nobody knew how to "pound the brass." Mr. Lewis, who occasionally took a flyer on the market in its palmy days recalled that Geo. Gilbert was the most famous operator on the "Street," and at once hunted him up. George, therefore, is in a measure responsible for the thrilling realism of the scene where Brachard pulls down the financial Dagon he has raised.

"The Seats of The Mighty."

Gilbert Parker's Popular Novel Made Into Seven-Reel Picture by Colonial Studio for World Film.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

THERE is much worth being enthusiastic over in this big feature "The Seats of the Mighty." It is a story of France, England and America at the period when Wolfe was conquering the French province of Canada with his British and Colonial-American troops. The audience at the Casino theater, New York City, watched it with close attention and there was a modicum of applause, rather for the happy fulfillment of the romance than for the picture as art. Yet there is much art and that of the best in the picture's graceful narrative, in the acting, especially of Lionel Barrymore as Dollaire, the villain, and in the direction. The staging of it is worthy of the highest praise—backgrounds sets, furniture (there's plenty of it used), and backgrounds are perfect. One might almost say that there wasn't a scene that was not wholly graceful and dignified.

There are two stories told in it. The first makes us concerned about some love letters of the graceful Du Barry of the French court; but in the third or fourth reel we realize that the film has quite forgotten about the letters and is solely interested in an wholly American love story. The heroine of this is the daughter of a rich Canadian of Quebec; the hero, a captive officer of Virginia, and the villain, a Frenchman who has come from the court—the seats of the mighty and from the king's favorite, Du Barry, with the object of getting the letters, but has fallen in love with the heroine and forgotten them—we find this out or come to suspect it with surprise, for no subtitle guided us to it. If the melodramatic love story had been the picture's chief object, it should have begun in America and not bothered with the European scenes or story. The director has left a few scenes—that where the villain visits the hero in his cell, for example—unconvincing though the action could easily have been made strong even there. But enough of critcism. The story is a most interesting one, there is no doubt at all of that and it is always clear enough to hold strongly. The offering will be a success. It doesn't bore at all and the grace and beauty of its scenes are not only once in a while, but often, as attractive as anything well could be.

The early scenes are in the court of Louis XV., then a few scenes of England are thrown in. It then switches to Virginia and shows how the captain, hero of the story, is captured and taken to Quebec, where he falls in love with Alexia. These Quebec scenes are courtly and very pleasing. The villain gets him accused of spying, he being out in the city on parole, and uses his danger to get the girl to consent to marry him. She helps the captain to free himself and the final close is when Wolfe takes the city.

BREEZE THE FEATURE OF "WALLS OF JERICHO."

In the Motion Picture World's review of the Box Office Attraction Company's release, "The Walls of Jericho," proper credit was not accorded to Edmund Breeze as the leading player of the cast. The subject was distinctly a Breeze feature and that popular actor does some of his best work in its scenes.

Oscar Eagle Directing "Runaway June."

"RUNAWAY JUNE," the new Reliance serial, which will be released early in January, will be produced by Oscar Eagle, who has just finished six one-reel features, each with a recognized star, for Sawyer, Inc.

Mr. Eagle, for the past two years, has been at the head of the "Selig Polyscope's" Chicago studio, producing feature dramas, and prior to that was associated with David Belasco, the greatest dramatic producer of the age.

Oscar Eagle.

Oscar Eagle entered the dramatic profession as an actor in the company of McKee Rankin, was successful, and followed with engagements in support of many famous players, including Frank Mayo, Frank Chanfrau, John McCulloch, Fanny Davenport, Mrs. Fiske, Viola Allen, Kyrle Bellew, Francis Starr and David Warfield, playing over 350 parts.

Over eighteen years ago he turned his attention to stage direction, and has since made many successful productions, notably for Liebler and Company, with whom he rehearsed many noted actors in the profession in such productions as "The Christian," "The Gentleman of France," "The Honor of the Humble," "Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch," and the all star cast of "Romeo and Juliet." He also staged and produced Browning's "In a Balcony."

Under David Belasco, the greatest producer of the age, Mr. Eagle attended to the chief productions under Mr. Belasco's direct supervision, and improved the opportunity to store up all he could learn from the wizard of stagecraft.

Mr. Eagle has spent the last two months in rehearsing and casting "Runaway June," and at present, the stock company for the gigantic production comprises over 60 members, the majority of whom came from the dramatic stage. The training which Mr. Eagle received under David Belasco is now being applied to the screen version of George Randolph Chester's masterpiece.

CARE IN PREPARING A PICTURE.

Carlyle Blackwell of the Favorite Players has his own way of preparing for his photoplays. There is virtually a committee of four to discuss productions. The scenario writer prepares the script and it is then discussed by Carlyle Blackwell, William D. Taylor, his assistant, Henry Kernan, and the writer of the photoplay. The script will probably be altered and another evening spent in licking it into shape, two if necessary. The costumes and sets are then discussed and decided upon and numerous drawings made. Finally, the company is picked, types being selected, and the photoplay is read to them, after which every member of the company is furnished with a copy of the script to study. Many rehearsals are then held before the play is started and in this way some degree of perfection is attained before the work is actually commenced.

THE NEXT EXCELSIOR RELEASE.

The next Excelsior Release will be entitled "In the Shadows." This story is taken from the book, "The Shadow," by John B. Hymer, and is a story of the loyalty and friendship of two men starting in their college days and continuing through a series of incidents, in which one of them is suspected of murder. Through it all runs the love of the hero for the sister of his chum and companion, and she by her grit and ready wit aids in unraveling the chain of circumstantial evidence which tends to the false conviction of her future husband. Throughout the story the breath of open air life and the sweet purity of true affection are strongly characterized in the actions of all the principals in the story.

"Her Duplicate Husband"

Unscrupulous Surgeon Makes Convict Look Exactly Like a Dead Count So He Can Get Fortune—Three-Reel Warners Features Offering.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

IT is a daring situation to utilize—the sending a man who looks or has been made to look like some one of whose life he knows nothing to take his place in society—but none will be found to say that it is an uninteresting situation. In this picture, "Her Duplicate Husband," made in France by Features Ideal, and now offered by Warners Features, the man impersonated is a rich count who has left his wife to run away with an actress. He is shipwrecked, picked up by a passing ship and dies at sea. The ship is commanded by convicts who have risen and overcome their guards. The convict-captain lets a surgeon make his face like that of the dead man and then goes back to France with one of his pals, also a convict. The most interesting character of the story is an old servant woman who knows that the count, who now lies at the bottom of the sea, had committed the very crime for which the convict, who now she thinks the count had been sentenced for. She had hidden her secret on account of the count's mother, whom she loved; but shortly after the convict-count's return home—he had a hard time with the wife at first because of the actress, but things had been smoothed over in that direction—the mother dies and the old servant woman demands that he get the convict (himself), released or she will tell the police all she knows. To make matters worse, the surgeon turns up and begins blackmailing him. At this point, the house is set on fire and the convict-count, the countess's "duplicate husband" is burned to death.

Wonderful photography marks the offering all through. The story seems a bit involved in places. The plot is haphazard in places, but never so much so that the thread of its story is obscured for long and it never fails to be interesting. The acting is, for the most part, very commendable. It is an unusual picture and, taking it as a whole, it ought to make a very acceptable offering of entertainment.

exhibition given at the World Film Corporation offices, of some of his work, at which some noted film men were present, his novel effects caused somewhat of a sensation, and he was in immediate demand by several of the big companies, but General Manager Lewis J. Selznick succeeded in signing up Mr. Levy, and his novelty films will be seen exclusively in the World Film Corporation service. The first release date is to be announced shortly.

Henry Walthall Joins Balboa.

HENRY B. WALTHALL, lauded by many dramatic critics as "the world's greatest moving picture actor," has signed a three-year contract with the Balboa Amusement Producing Company, of Long Beach, California, his salary being $1,000 a week. He will be starred in four-reel and six-reel productions of famous novels, the supporting company to be more than a score of noted players. The name of the director of the company is withheld for the present, but it can be said that he is one of the best known and most talented producers in the cinema field.

Henry B. Walthall.

Millions of theatergoers throughout the world esteem Mr. Walthall for his well-nigh inspired talents as the leading player in the massive productions of "The Avenging Conscience," "Home, Sweet Home," "Judith of "Bethulia" and "The Gangsters." He also enacted the star part in "The Clansman," another Griffith film not yet released. Mr. Walthall's friends believe that his genius and talents contributed in the highest degree to the world-wide success that attended the exhibition of these big productions.

Mr. Walthall's contract calls for six days of work each week, seven hours a day and, at his salary of $1,000 a week, he will receive about $166.66 a day, $23.80 an hour, or about 40 cents a minute. No deduction of his salary is to be made because of cloudy weather or failure of the company to make pictures owing to other adverse reasons, hence the star will be richer $166.66 at the close of every working day for three years, each year's total salary being $52,000, or $156,000 for the three years' work. During the second and third year he is to receive a royalty bonus on every foot of film made in which he is the star and this income is expected to make his pay advance during the latter years to a total of about $75,000 a year.

SOCIETY WORKING ON EDUCATIONALS.

The churches and Y. M. C. A. halls throughout the country are to be utilized by the Religious and Educational Motion Picture Society, of Philadelphia, Pa., for the purpose of showing religious, educational, scientific, industrial and travel motion picture films. Preparations are now being made to film biblical dramas, together with the striking scenes from the New Testament. The scientific department will film many of the wonders of the microscope. The history department will film the history of the United States, both by states and in the presidential periods. Among the men who are associated with this movement are the Rev. Floyd Tomkins, Dr. David Starr Jordan, Theodore N. Vail, Dr. Isaac Sharpless.

BERST GOING BACK TO PATHE?

A persistent rumor was circulated last week to the effect that J. A. Berst, vice-president of the General Film Company, was about to resign that position to accept an offer from Charles Pathe to return to his old place at the head of the American Pathe Company. No word of confirmation was obtainable from the most interested parties, but it is believed that there is sufficient ground for the rumor.

VERY much in accord with theatric convention as it was forty years ago, "Young Mrs. Winthrop" is given according to the stage version, excepting only the "aides" then in use. Bronson Howard was about the last man among playwrights to favor adherence to the imitative and reflective, to which producers, even in his time, were given from inability to grasp the import of progress. They were then copying old plays. But he was a man of growth, a pioneer, who scorned of such methods. He had been a dramatic critic for some time before he entered seriously upon his career as a dramatist, and he acquired the clear vision of men actively engaged in newspaper work, the ability to look ahead. He was one of the best critics in America and an able writer when he decided to break through the trammels of tradition and write plays that were original and truly American.

Howard's "Young Mrs. Winthrop" was an attack on the traditions and affectation of American society about the time of the Franco-Prussian war last century. It was a strong domestic play. Strong because of its arraignment of those social phases which draw husband and wife apart; conditions which obtain under different circumstances today. The man is absorbed in his struggle to maintain a family he has indulged, and the romance is merely the result of her luxurious environment. A misunderstanding arises when young Mrs. Winthrop visits a lady of good social connections and bad social inclinations in order to save young Mrs. Winthrop's mother from impending business disgrace, and husband and wife decided to separate.

Bronson Howard infused a lot of vigor into this situation by sheer force of masterful intellectuality. His scholarly mind and magnificent training under Whitelaw Reid and as both editor and dramatic critic on a number of prominent papers enabled him to put an edge on a great deal that was said—he was no butterknife, but a Damascus blade when he chose to cut—and he slashed mercilessly, though so gracefully that society enjoyed being carved. The action, however, is not so significant.

When the family attorney, an old personal friend of both, attempts to reconcile them, he resorts first to recalling their early happiness, done in the photodrama by reverting through pictures to their courtship and honeymoon. He then drives home their duty to society and softens their hearts by a delicate reference to the child they have lost, with a result that the wife recognizes her supreme mission and the husband decides to divert some of his devotion to maternal acquirement to the spiritual side of the marriage relation.

Arthur D. Hotaling.

ARTHUR D. HOTALING is nominally chief comedy producer for the Lubin Company, but in the course of his career he has mastered so much more in order to become the maker of the famous Lubin split-reels, that those who are aware of his twenty years in the employ of Mr. Lubin know him to be a man of far wider experience than is usually found in the director of photoplays.

Arthur D. Hotaling.

Mr. Hotaling's connection with the Lubin enterprises, and his active participation therein, has made him a highly developed expert in all branches of motion picture manufacture, such as is not given many men to attain. Years ago under his management at San Souci Park, Chicago, Mr. Lubin opened a picture theater, said to be the first in this country. Later Hotaling had charge of the Lubin exhibit at the Pan-American Exposition.

Today he is managing director of the studio at Jacksonville, Florida, with four producers under his supervision, and a company of forty-five players. Naturally, this has been the evolution of a man gifted at the outset who has gradually advanced himself through unremitting earnestness and fidelity to the art. The perfectly equipped Lubin studio did not go up in a night, nor was its perfect organization the result of chance. All has come about as the result of years of observation and study. Likewise when he began producing, the excellent director did not achieve the present Lubin standard of comedy photoplays. Their inimitable style has been perfected through the experiments of years of work and patience. They stand as complete expression of Hotaling's own individuality and ideas.

A keen student of human nature, with his ear ever at the pulse of public demand, he is content to rest on their judgment of his work. For this reason the director is consistently reticent. He cares nothing for publicity and prefers to do things his own way, quietly and without a blare of bugles. He has no fads or avocations. His motor car constitutes his sole relaxation. Outside this he has no interest save in his home and his work.

PRODUCES FIVE FEATURES AT SAME TIME.

To commence four big features, two of them five-reel length and one six, and produce them practically simultaneously, is a feat that is seldom attempted or encouraged among producers. Romaine Fielding, producer, author and leading man for the Lubin Company, has accomplished this feat, however, and this in spite of the fact that he is not a believer in rushing films through. "In the Hour of Disaster," in five reels, "The Disaster," in five reels, "The Brute in the Jug," in two reels, and "The Valley of Lost Hope," in six reels, are the titles of the plays in question. The two first named have just been completed and will shortly be released by the Lubin Company. The last two are still in preparation at Betzwood, Philadelphia, Pa. All the plays were commenced Sept. 7. Mr. Fielding plays the leads in them besides being the director.

MOTION PICTURE MUSICAL COMEDY.

The Renfax Film Company, Inc., manufacturer of musical motion pictures, New York, put a company in rehearsal Tuesday, Nov. 24, headed by Jose Collins with two principals and a chorus of twenty to produce a fifteen-minute song sketch. This is the first of a big series of "tabloid motion picture musical comedies" featuring notable comic opera stars. Jose Collins is starring on Broadway at present in the comic opera, "Suzi." Frank Smithson, the musical comedy stage director, has charge of the Collins production.

Manufacturers' Advance Notes

SENSATIONS IN LUBIN'S "MAN FROM THE SEA."

The sinking of a Herreshoff steam yacht off Jacksonville, Florida, and the plunge of a touring car from a wharf into the ocean are two of the sensational features of the two-reel photoplay "The Man from the Sea" which is released by the Lubin Manufacturing Co., December 10.

"The Man from the Sea" was written by Charles Goddard and Paul Dickey, authors of "The Ghost Breaker" and "The Misleading Lady," and was adapted for the camera by George Terwilliger of the Lubin staff of directors.

Scene from "The Man from the Sea" (Lubin.)

In order to get the proper background for the story Mr. Lubin sent a special company to Florida and purchased the steam yacht to use in the big climax. The story itself is intensely dramatic. Two millionaires, both of whom are wireless experts, are in love with the same girl. They play cards to decide which shall wed the girl and one of them cheats. The loser goes on board his steam yacht and while he is in his wireless room the crew lock him in, desert and set fire to the yacht. The millionaire is drowned and in his wireless room. The weird messages sent by him and his subsequent return from the bottom of the ocean to claim his rightful bride makes one of the most intensely dramatic and sensational photoplays imaginable.

As a marine spectacle the burning of the steam yacht and its disappearance under the waves is magnificent. Another sensation in the play is the wild flight of an automobile, with two of the leading characters in the front seat, the length of an old wharf and into the ocean. In order to secure the under water pictures, where the drowned millionaire sends wireless messages to his rival on shore, it was necessary to construct a special glass tank and the effect obtained is startling. The play is one of the costliest two-reelers the Lubin Company has ever produced, and incidentally one of the most sensational.

SELZNICK GRABS MORE BRANCH MANAGERS.

Louis J. Selznick, general manager of the World Film Corporation, announces that he has secured the services of Frank H. Vine, Robert Etris and H. C. Holah as branch managers for his exchanges. Mr. Vine entered the business as manager of the Howard Moving Picture Company. He has since been manager of the Boston office of the General Film Company and manager of the Pittsburgh office of the Eclectic Film Company, afterward being transferred to the Boston office of the same company. He will take charge of the New England branch of the World Film.

Robert Etris became known to exhibitors first as manager of the Lubin Film Exchange, of Philadelphia, Pa. Subsequently he became branch manager for the General Film Company and then manager of the Philadelphia branch of the Eclectic. He is now manager of the Philadelphia branch of the World Film.

Mr. Holah has also been branch manager for the General and Eclectic Film Companies in Cleveland, Ohio, and now becomes manager of the Cleveland office of the World Film.

SELIG JUNGLE-ZOO PICTURES.

The interest manifested by exhibitors all over the country, and the favor which moving picture theatre audiences have shown the novel Selig Jungle-Zoo wild animal pictures, have caused Mr. Selig to arrange for placing one of these unusual one-reel features on the program for each week.

The day for the release of this weekly feature, will be Saturday of each week, begining with Saturday, December 19. On that date will be released a Jungle-Zoo picture, entitled "The Lady or the Tigers." On the following Saturday, December 26, "The Champion Bear Slayer" will be released, and on the next Saturday, January 2, a particularly exciting one will be released, called "Lassoing a Lion." Mr. Selig has arrived at the conclusion that one-reel animal pictures will supply a particularly apparent want.

A large number of these Selig one-reel Jungle-Zoo wild animal pictures are in course of work in Los Angeles, and Kathlyn Williams is being featured in the greater number of them.

In the story of "The Lady or the Tigers," to be released Saturday, December 19, Kathlyn Williams enters a den of tigers and with her unparalled bravery and fearlessness, follows the teachings of a professional animal trainer, who has guarded her efforts and surrounds her rehearsals with every possible safeguard. It is a well known fact among those who handle wild animals, that it is the personality of the man or woman who handles the beasts that permits success. Kathlyn Williams possesses all of the attributes of success in this work as is amply testified by the various Selig Jungle Zoo pictures in which she has appeared before the public during the past year.

Scene from "The Lady of the Tigers" (Selig).

A great many letters have been received at the Selig executive offices inquiring about future releases of wild animal pictures, especially single reel pictures. The requests of the exhibitors are to be supplied from now on and every Saturday will afford additional attractions for the patrons of motion picture theatres because of these new Selig features.

"A RECENT CONFEDERATE VICTORY" (Lubin).

Emmett Campbell Hall is a past-master at writing American war stories, not necessarily battle stories, but the beautiful pathetic tales of love and adventure with which the period was so richly productive. This tale tells of an old negro who has become well-to-do, but longs for one more look at the old home in "Old Virginia" and to see what the kiddie, his young master looks like now that he has grown to be a stalwart man. He finds the family in very poor circumstances and then remembers that many years ago he assisted in burying an iron box of bonds belonging to the old master and which had never been discovered. A keen money lender had long tried to buy the homestead hoping to find the treasure box. The negro enters into a deal with the money lender who succeeds in buying the farm for enough money to put the family beyond want, then the iron box is discovered and dug up. On opening the box it is found to contain $125,000 in Confederate bonds, which of course, are of no value. By selling the homestead to the loan shark they are placed beyond want but the purchaser is beaten at his own game.

"NELL OF THE CIRCUS" (Sawyer).

"Nell of the Circus" is a four-act melodrama written and starred in by Cecil Spooner, who played it several hundred times as a regular theatrical attraction. In the dramatic version the play was condensed into three acts, with three settings, but in the film version there are nearly two hundred scenes, and several hundred people appear in them. For the production it was necessary to engage the whole of a great circus, and scenes in the interior of the tents while a performance is going on, the entry by Miss Spooner into a lion's cage, and dozens of other thrilling happenings combine to make this one of the most exciting plays of the season, as well as the most successful film production in which the popular star has ever appeared.

THE WAYS OF SPECULATORS PICTURED.

"The Place, The Time and The Man," released by Essanay December 4, is an excellent portrayal of the methods of "wild-cat" speculators in the financial world. It reveals the system of how unscrupulous operators manipulate the market by booming or depressing stocks artificially in order to crush competitors.

ALLIANCE TO RELEASE "THE LAST EGYPTIAN."

The Alliance Films Corporation and the Oz-Film Co. have concluded negotiations whereby the latter concern will release all of Oz's future releases exclusively on the Alliance Programme. "The Last Egyptian," a drama of modern Egypt, will be the first subject to be put forth under the new contract, and was released Dec. 7.

Those who have viewed this film all agree that L. Frank Baum, the head of the Oz Film Co., has proven that he is as adept and ingenious as a dramatic producer as he is a creator of fantastic romances of Ozland.

MADAM PETROVA IN "THE TIGRESS."

The forthcoming release of the Popular Plays and Players Company through the program of the Alco Film Corporation will mark the first, and perhaps the only, appearance of the brilliant and versatile dramatic star, Madame Olga Petrova, in a thrillingly appropriate production, "The Tigress," in which the international star will have apt opportunity to display her histrionic wares to her heart's content.

"The Tigress" as a story opens in Russia, and then the locale is changed to America. The part Madame Petrova will play allows her the most widely different channels in which to guide her powers of emotion.

As a mother, in the opening, the degenerating wife, the malicious woman and the revengeful creature, throughout the five reels, there is a constant changing of demeanor and temperament.

The production was staged at the studios of the Popular Plays and Players Company, Fort Lee, and before being released will be shown to Madame Petrova and coterie of friends at the actress's home.

MARY FULLER IN "THE HEART OF THE HILLS" (Universal).

Hal Reid's three-reel feature photodrama, "The Heart of the Hills," in which Mary Fuller plays the stellar role, is to be released under the Victor (Universal) brand on December 17. Mr. Reid has written an out o' door drama which fairly breathes of the piney woods.

The role of 'Lisbeth Ann, written especially for Miss Fuller, fits her like the proverbial glove. In a gingham gown and bare feet she presents a bewitching picture in the earlier scenes; and later, when society has made her its pet in the great city, she displays her versatility and consummate artistry by carrying into the enaction of the haute monde role the same charming simplicity of the mountain lass, softened by contact with the refining influences of her surroundings.

Mr. Reid has written a virile story as a vehicle for Miss Fuller, and the locations chosen by Director Walter Edwin reveal the discriminating hand of a producer who knows how to work hand in hand with his author and principals. Charles Ogle as Rodger Matthews, a young surveyor, has evidently thoroughly familiarized himself with the duties of a rod and chain man in preparing to enact the role "opposite" Miss Fuller. In everything he has undertaken Ogle has always shown himself a master of detail, and as the young surveyor in "The Heart of the Hills" he exhibits the technique of a young George Washington plotting his first governmental survey.

TO RELEASE "THE SIGN OF THE CROSS" DEC. 21.

The Famous Players have decided to change the release date of the spectacular film version of Wilson Barrett's immortal drama, "The Sign of the Cross," originally scheduled for release in February, to Dec. 21. The change was made because of the peculiar appropriateness of the subject as a pre-Christmas release.

The Famous Players' impressive production of this sublime drama has created a furore throughout England, where it was released during the summer in order to fill booking dates secured as early in advance of the production as last February.

"FANTASMA," BIG FIVE-REEL EDISON SPECTACLE COMING.

The Edison Company is to release on December 19, a five-part adaptation of the famous Hanlon Brothers' fantasy, "Fantasma." It is to be distributed by the General Film Company and is said to be one of the finest offerings that the Edison Company has as yet put out. George Hanlon, Jr., played Pico, the clown, with W. T. and George Shrode, famous pantomimists, as spirits. Charles M. Seay is the producer. It will surely be most welcome as a big holiday feature. It is a sort of fairy version of the Faust and Marguerite story, in which pathos is relieved by drollery that is wholly contagious and to which mystery and romance and adventure and beauty all add their portion to a wonderfully delightful effect.

"AS A MAN SOWS" (Sawyer).

Sawyer, Inc., will soon release a five-part drama entitled "As a Man Sows," a product of the Aquilla studios of Milan. The picture will be ready in about three weeks and will have a good line of advertising.

M. ROSENBERG DISTRIBUTING "THE SPOILERS."

CONSIGNMENT OF "ELECTRA" CARBONS RECEIVED.

Hugo Reisinger announces in this issue that he has succeeded in getting through a consignment of the well-known "Electra" Pink Label carbons, and will endeavor to get through further supplies so as to take care of the requirements of the trade. Of course shipping is very uncertain and under the circumstances it would seem advisable to keep a good stock on hand. The war has now lasted about four months and very few carbon shipments have come through so far.

Mr. Reisinger is using his utmost endeavors to get further shipments in order to supply the trade as regularly as possible, but nobody can tell what may be the developments of the conflict may lead to, so that a wise consumer should not take any chances, especially as carbons do not deteriorate. It should be added that the factory is working only to about one-third its capacity, and all carbon factories in Germany are very busy making up searchlight carbons for the government, of which great quantities are being used daily.

"Electra" Pink Label carbons will, in future, be wrapped in special wax moisture proof paper, thus insuring that every bundle of carbons, no matter when used and no matter where it has been stored, will be absolutely dry. In the past there have been complaints that when carbons were first put in the lamps they sputtered and this, no doubt, was caused by the carbons having become damp because they were stored in some moist place, or they will sometimes acquire this dampness in the voyage across the ocean.

CAMERAMAN TAKES REAL WAR PICTURES.

Chester A. Lyons, head camera man for the Bermuda stock of the Victory Film Company, under the direction of James Gordon, has just returned to this country after a six months' sojourn at that place, where a number of special features were produced. Shortly after war was declared, the English Government absolutely forbade the taking of any motion pictures under penalty of imprisonment and the company made arrangements to return here at once.

Notwithstanding this, Mr. Lyons, at great personal risk, managed to secure a number of still pictures of the military, and also of the famous Lincolnshire Regiment, oftentimes called the King's Best, leaving for the front fully equipped for a long and arduous campaign. He also took pictures of the newly arrived Canadian recruits. Had Mr. Lyons been detected while taking these pictures he would have undoubtedly been sentenced to prison, as it was a direct disobedience of military orders. These pictures were purchased by the New York Herald and used in a recent Sunday issue with great effect, as they were the only authentic pictures taken of the recent military activity in Bermuda.

"PARAMOUNT PROGRESS."

The campaign of publicity planned by the Paramount Pictures Corporation has been started with the first issue of the weekly publication called "Paramount Progress." The weekly is printed on fine paper and full of interesting matter for exhibitors who are using Paramount film or who want to learn about Paramount plans and ideas.

FRITZI BRUNETTE.

FRITZI BRUNETTE who has been attracting much attention in a few of the leading brands of the Universal films for the past few years, where her promotion has been very rapid, has been secured by the Santa Barbara Film Company of Santa Barbara, California, to play leading roles in their brands. These will be released by the Mica Film Corporation on the Kriterion Programme. Robert Daly, who was formerly director with the Universal and is now directing for the Santa Barbara, was instrumental in securing the services of Miss Brunette to work for his company under his direction. Big things are predicted of Miss Brunette and Mr. Alexander, who will play leads opposite under the direction of Mr. Daly.

Fritzi Brunette.

Miss Brunette is sincere and convincing in any role she portrays. Her black hair, deep hazel eyes and a clear olive complexion combine a type of rare beauty. She is generally acknowledged to be one of the youngest and most beautiful leading women in the motion picture field.

A little incident which lends a touch of human interest in the life of Miss Brunette happened in Santa Barbara several days ago. She was approached by a little girl who told her that people said she looked like Miss Brunette and that she wanted to know all about the films and how she could become a star. Miss Brunette was touched by the tot's sympathetic style and took her along to the studio where she was shown the "inside workings" of a real factory. Miss Brunette seems to take as much interest in the little one as she does in her own career. Through her pretty face and pleasant manner the little girl has become the pet of the whole company at the studio.

FERGUSON BOOKING M. P. CIRCUIT.

Frederic L. Ferguson, manager of the New York branch of the George Kleine Attractions, Candler Theater Building, for the past year, has resigned. His action in relinquishing this position was resultant from his acceptance of a lucrative offer to book a large circuit of motion picture theaters throughout New York State. His headquarters, commencing next Monday, will be in the Strand Theater Building.

Mr. Ferguson has been associated with the motion picture game since its incipiency, leaving the legitimate theatrical field to associate himself with this new field of entertainment. He was selected by the George Kleine Attractions to direct its campaign among the exhibitors in this section because of his widespread reputation of being one of the most popular and ablest salesmen of features in the metropolis. That his selection for the place of New York branch manager by that firm was not an unwise one has been indubitably evinced by the extraordinarily large business that has been its portion during his tenure of office. That his services were thoroughly appreciated was made patent by the obvious reluctance of the George Kleine Attractions to accept his resignation, consenting only after the strongest urging on the part of Mr. Ferguson.

FERGUSON who appears in his original role of Pop Clarke in the photoplay version of "The Deep Purple," in which Clara Kimball Young is starring, under the direction of the World Film Corporation, has the honor of being the oldest American actor on the stage, and he is the sole surviving member of the cast that supported Laura Keene at Ford's Theater, Washington, the night President Lincoln was assassinated.

Many tales are told of the daring of motion picture actors. It is seldom, however, that what is known as "water stuff" is attempted by a man who is unable to swim. This curious distinction is due, however, to William A. Williams, of the Excelsior Feature Film Company, who, in the next release, a five-part picture, released through the Alliance program, under the title of "In the Shadow," is thrown over a fifty-foot cliff, into the swift and turbulent waters of the river below. L. S. Levin, who started the Box Office Attractions Company's Boston office in March, only to be relieved three weeks ago, is once again handling the destinies of that company in this section. Since his return he is supplying the Keith houses in Providence and Pawtucket, R. I., with his company's features.

F. H. Vine, who recently resigned as New England manager of the Eclectic Film Company, is in charge of the Boston office of the World Film Corporation, assisted by Louis Machatt as sales manager. A. N. Webster, formerly of the Syracuse office of the Eclectic Company and a former road man for the General Film Company, is in charge of the New England office of the Eclectic Film Company in the Scollay Building, Boston.

Samuel Pinanski, manager of the Modern theater, Boston, believes that his patrons should possess a thorough knowledge of the doings of his popular playhouse and has decided to issue a weekly publication, to be known as "Modern Times." The paper will contain four pages and will be the size of a regulation newspaper. It will contain brief stories of the feature attractions to appear with biographies of the performers. It will be mailed to persons whose names are on a new subscription list which he is compiling. During the first week of the enterprise he received over 5,000 names. Although the Modern is only a year old, nevertheless, its patronage is the best. It is no uncommon sight to see nurses in the employ of Boston's most aristocratic families bring the children to this house in automobiles.

J. A. O'Brien, manager of the Empire theater at Lewiston, Maine, announces that his house is playing to capacity, featuring the Box Office Attractions Company's film "Life's Shop Window."

The Gem theater at Lewiston, Maine, of which Frank S. Hoy is manager, will close on January 1. J. J. McCarthy, the owner, has sold his site to a drygoods house. The theater will be razed and a modern business block will be erected.

The Boston Opera House, which began to feature Paramount Films last week, has been playing to capacity. The four-reel picture, "Mrs. Black Is Back," featuring May Irwin, is this week's attraction.

The Boston American has the distinction of being the first Boston paper to start a moving picture page. This page will be featured every Sunday by the publishers and they are advertising it extensively during the week. Although it has only appeared one Sunday, nevertheless it has proven quite popular with the film men. Harlow Hare is the editor of the feature.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

THE ideal weather of last week served to greatly increase box office receipts, for which all of the exhibitors are duly thankful, coming, as it did, at the end of a very nerve-racking period of poor business. The exchangemen are not quite so excited, for they report that collections were never slower in their recollection than during the past week. This is, indeed, a strange condition, for it seems that all of the houses in the National Capital on Thanksgiving Day were filled to capacity and a majority of them had ten-cent shows with big features and excellent results. It is believed that from now on the motion picture exhibitors will come into their own and that everything will be lovely.

Every once in a while there is an outburst of feeling that the days of the five-cent shows are rapidly nearing an end, and without a doubt this is largely true here. The people are demanding better productions; they want the "big stuff," and for this they are, as a rule, willing to pay the price. It is suicidal for an exhibitor to attempt to comply with public opinion without looking for increased tariffs. It is expected that during the coming year, the demand for features will be enormous. This is evidenced by the fact that daily the feature service men are in consultation with large numbers of both local and out-of-town exhibitors who are placing orders for such service. The boom given to moving pictures some years ago here will be greatly overshadowed by that which is to come is acknowledged by all.

Fred Wright, who operates the Colonial theater in Hagerstown, Md., and who has recently taken over the Casino in Martinsburg, W. Va., was in town last week booking features for both houses.

Nat Glaser, of the Leader theater, is feeling the pulse of the public with respect to ten-cent shows, and will give such performances several days a week, when he will run features.

Bohanan & Lewy, who operate the Wizard theater, in Baltimore, Md., were seen here last week.

The Andrew J. Thomas Company was last week incorporated with a capital stock of $2,000, divided into 200 shares, at a par value of $10 each, for the purpose of conducting moving picture and vaudeville performances. Maurice Thomas, Vincent Thomas, Louis Thomas and Andrew Thomas are the trustees for the first year. The place of business is given as the Howard theater, on T street, near Seventh street, Northwest.

Dallas D. Ball is about to open a moving picture theater in Clarendon, Va. This will be the first house in that locality.

Major Alfred A. Pruden, a chaplain in the Coast Artillery Corps, will give motion picture exhibitions and lectures at Fort Monroe, Va. At this army post there are about 120 officers and more than 1,500 enlisted men who are welcoming Chaplain Pruden's announcement. Many of the films to be shown will be of an educational character dealing with life in the army and navy and methods and the sciences of war.

Billie Airey, who operates the Apollo theater in Martinsburg, W. Va., for the National Amusement Company, was seen in the film district here last week.

The Rev. Fr. J. A. Curran of Harper's Ferry, W. Va., has contracted for film service on the basis of three shows a week to be given in the Catholic Church at that place for the benefit of his parishioners.

The Empire and Apollo theaters, both located on H street, Northeast, are enclosing their lobbies in more or less elaborate style in preparation of the cold weather soon to come. The Apollo lobby is very large, in fact, almost as large as some of the smaller theaters, and the wind blowing in would make things rather disagreeable for those having to wait until the end of a show to gain admission to the theater. The need for such protection at the Empire is not so marked, but good judgment is shown on the part of Manager Greenberg for his desire to increase the comfort of his patrons.

The Dixie theater, on H street, at the corner of Eighth street, Northeast, was the scene of a turkey raffle on Thanksgiving Day eve, when double tickets were used and two fine birds held up as prizes to the holders of lucky numbers.

A. G. Irvine, who has been traveling through the south for the World Film Corporation, reports business conditions in that section to be improving. "While business has been very quiet there," said Mr. Irvine, "I find that the exhibitors in the various places which I visited are taking heart and are becoming more optimistic. The cotton situation has been somewhat relieved and with more money in sight, the motion picture men are contracting for a few features with a view of trying out the business possibilities. Thus, I have been able to do a far more satisfactory business than on my last trip and have obtained a lot of good contracts." At the Washington office it was said that prospects were better; more people were coming in to look over what the World Film Corporation has to offer than has been the case for some time.

The Electric Theater Supply Company, according to Manager George Smiley, will commence weekly releases under the Alliance program on December 12. Mr. Smiley reports that he has already signed up a satisfactory number of exhibitors for that service.

Earle E. Reese, road man for the Electric Theater Supply Company, has just returned from a trip through Virginia and reports doing a better business than on his last visit to the Virginia cities.

It is rumored that a motion picture theater is soon to be opened on Four-and-a-Half street, Southwest.

The Moving Picture World correspondent found David F. Cowan and J. A. Kloman sunning their heels on the fifth floor of the State, War and Navy Building awaiting an opportunity of showing off their Simplex and Motiograph machines, respectively, to Captain Gordon Robinson, of the Quartermaster Corps, who is to have last say in the matter of the purchase of the sixty-six machines which are to be distributed among the various army posts. In addition to the Simplex and the two models of the Motiograph, there is an Edison Kinetoscope, a Baird, an Animatograph and Powers 5, 6 and 6A. Fred Swett is looking after the latter. Daily there are motion picture exhibitions with music furnished by various phonographs, which are also entered in a like competition. The audience, in addition to Captain Robinson and his assistants consist of all the clerks and messengers who can possibly steal away from their duties for a few minutes. The films for the most part are being furnished by the Navy Department and consist of pictures taken in Mexican waters and other views of extreme interest. After the purchase has been made, the films will be either purchased outright by the post exchanges or will be taken on rental. It is expected that the soldiers will be called upon to pay an admission of but one cent. Mr. Kloman was out in Denver, Colo., when word came from the Chicago office of the Enterprise Optical Manufacturing Company that his services were needed in Washington. He reports that he found business very good in the grain country. Mr. Cowan was traveling through Canada when ordered here. He states that the moving picture business in the Dominion is not up to the usual standard. Mr. Cowan stopped over in Buffalo before coming here, where a surprise awaited him at the Interior Department, where he secured a contract for four motor-driven Simplex projecting machines, each equipped with an arc controller, which are to be sent to the Panama Pacific Exposition at San Francisco for use in connection with the Government motion picture exhibit.

Tom Moore last week had as his guests at the Strand theater, between four and five hundred newsboys of the city at an exhibition of "Wild Flower," with Marguerite Clark in the title role.

Everywhere regret is being expressed at the untimely death of Dr. William H. Wunder, who, for a time, was owner of the Maryland motion picture theater, and who was a member of the syndicate which built the Imperial theater, now Moore's Garden, on Ninth street, Northwest. Dr. Wunder was injured at Scott Circle when a tire of a front wheel of the automobile in which he was returning to his home, at 1936 Calvert street, Northwest, exploded and caused the overturning of the car. Dr. Wunder fell on the back of his head, sustaining a compound fracture of the skull, disclocating his right shoulder and receiving internal injuries. He was hurried to a hospital where an operation was immediately performed, but he did not regain consciousness. He was fifty-four years of age, was a member of many organizations and active in civic work. In addition to conducting a successful dental business, he was at the head of taxicab service. Dr. Wunder was a great friend of many exhibitors and exchangemen and his death is a matter of regret with them.

MISSOURI.

IT is up to the downtown theaters in Kansas City, Mo., to get together on their prices of admission. About a year ago nearly all of the downtown houses agreed to raise their prices from five to ten cents, and did so. However this lasted for but a short time and most of the houses lowered to five cents again. Since then they have been charging five cents every day but Saturday and Sundays, and on days when features were shown. This system is very unsatisfactory both to the patrons and exhibitors, and there is no question but that the productions which are being put out now are worth ten cents. One patron said, "I don't object to paying ten cents for a ten-cent show, but I do object to paying ten cents and then seeing the same picture a few days later for five cents." The question has now gone so far as to reach to council, and Isaac Reicher, councilman, says that he believes it unfair that the five-cent shows should pay the same licenses as the ten-cent houses, and the result has been that the matter will be laid before the council within a few days.

The Lona theater, together with the Le Grande garage, at Sedalia, Mo., gave a very interesting entertainment November 16 with the films showing the manufacture of the Maxwell motorcar. These films have been shown all over Kansas and Missouri, and they seem to attract more attention at every showing.

The Empress theatre at Joplin has found a cheap and satisfactory way to advertise. In each issue of the Joplin News-Herald a coupon with a large number on it is printed next to the theater's ad. When a person has secured three of these coupons with consecutive numbers he is entitled to a free admission to one matinee. Consequently the daily ad of the evening performance is read; and the party goes to the theater to a matinee, which, as a rule, needs the added attendance more than the evening performances.

Joseph Gilday, booking agent for the Willis Wood theater, returned to Kansas City from New York, where he secured the "Christian." Mr. Gilday said that he wasn't going to take any chances on not securing the play, so he brought it back with him in his grip, and he says that the eight reels got rather heavy before he arrived in Kansas City.

J. C. Woolf, manager of the Kansas City office of Warner's Features, has been transferred from the Kansas City territory to the Intermountain territory, with offices in Denver, Colo. His new territory covers Colorado, Utah, Montana and Idaho. Richard Broderick, former manager of the Warner office in Detroit, Mich., has been put in charge of the Kansas City office.

P. J. Hall, special representative for the Ramo, is still in charge of the Kansas City office of this company. Mr. Hall says that the business of the past two weeks has shown a gratifying increase over that of those preceding it.

The Idle Hour theater in Kansas City is getting out a little booklet each week that it gives to all of its patrons. This little booklet contains all the advance bookings of the house and does a great deal towards bringing people to the theater. It contains advertisements from most of the large business houses in the city, and is arranged by Robert G. Perkins, manager of the advertising department of the theater.

W. R. Scates, division manager of the World Feature Film Corporation, is in Kansas City at the present time managing the affairs of the Kansas City office. N. H. Spitzer, former manager of the Kansas City office, has resigned and has taken a position with the Box Office Attractions as manager. Mr. Scates will probably appoint a new manager of the Kansas City office within a short time.

It is reported in Kansas City that the Alamo theater, belonging to the Triangle Amusement Company, will reopen in a short time after being closed all summer.

The glass front that the carpenters have been working on for two weeks at the Royal theater is now completed. The upper part consists of a latticed arrangement with small diamond-shaped panes of glass. The lower part is composed of swinging glass doors, the wood framework is stained cherry and is in harmony with the other wood decorations of the theater both inside and out.

The work of making the Empress building ready for occupancy by the Universal Film Company is rapidly nearing completion. The window glass has all been put in, the wall replastered and the film vault completed. The company will probably move into its quarters in a short time.

CINCINNATI.

MOORMAN & JOHNS, proprietors of the Park Hall theater, the big house in Oakley, a Cincinnati suburb, have run into a controversy on the subject of union labor, the demand being made upon them recently that only union operators be employed. One of the operators in the Park Hall is a resident of Oakley, being paid the same scale as the union men; but the union has demanded, none the less, that he be discharged. In this quandary the proprietors of the theater have decided to submit the decision of the matter to their patrons. Votes will be taken each night during week, arguments pro and con being presented on the screen and by speakers, in order that the voting may be intelligently conducted. In this way the matter will be decided, as far as the theater is concerned, by public opinion, and it is hoped that the decision will be accepted by the union, in case it proves adverse, as it will be by the theater.

A Cincinnati scientist, Dr. Edward H. Thompson, of 368 Howell avenue, has for some months been taking motion pictures in his laboratories of various subjects of scientific and medical interest. Subjects involving vivisection are taken, making the experiment available for hundreds of thousands of students and scientists, and thus reducing the sacrifice involved by just that much. The films are rented or sold to colleges and learned societies, and are proving immensely useful.

A mystery of the real Sherlock Holmes sort was uncovered during the progress of the work of remodeling the old Gayety theater, in Cincinnati, for its conversion into the Strand, destined to be the largest down-town picture house in the Queen City. A leather bill-case, containing $382 in cash, a Cincinnati city bond of the value of $500 and two valuable rings, was found by workmen on the building, and the only clue to its owner are the initials "A. E. W." printed in gold on the case. The wallet was found in a brick wall which was being torn down in making the 15-foot excavation beneath the orchestra pit necessary to provide foundation space for the $20,000 organ which is to be installed. It is said that several years ago, while the building was under construction, one of the contractors lost some valuables, and had a workman arrested on suspicion, and the articles found were probably those lost at that time.

"The Spoilers," the big Selig production, made an appearance in Cincinnati last week, several leading houses drawing big business by the exhibition of this striking drama. The Orpheum used this attraction to draw its usual Sunday houses, while the Alhambra, on Fifth street, showed it on Tuesday and Wednesday with equal success.

The opening of the new Alhambra theater, the latest of the string of houses owned by Gus Sun, the well-known theatrical magnate, at Marion, O., was an event of note. Many notables attended, including Senator-Elect Warren G. Harding, who delivered an address to which Mr. Sun responded. The house will show the best of vaudeville and motion pictures, Mr. Sun promising to maintain a high level of merit in the attractions offered. He motored over from Springfield to the opening of his newest house. At the conclusion of the initial performance an elaborate banquet was served on the stage, at which the numerous guests invited to the show by Mr. Sun gathered around the board. During the entire evening the owner was kept busy opening telegrams of congratulation from his friends. H. F. Moyer is resident manager of the new theater, which started its career with every indication of continued success.

"Julius Caesar" was the attraction at the Southern theater, of Columbus, during the week of November 16, the management thinking enough of the attraction to advertise it extensively all over the State. The result was that many visitors from the smaller towns in the vicinity attended, just as they do when a theatrical attraction of unusual merit appears at a city theater. Prices were raised to 25 cents, but this did not affect the attendance, apparently.

Portsmouth, O., is one of the latest of the Ohio towns to be immortalized by the film route, if the plans of F. M. Burdick, of the Animated Advertising Company, of Cincinnati, are carried out, as they apparently will be. Mr. Burdick visited Portsmouth recently to make arrangements to film all points of interest in the town, including the leading industries, and met with an enthusiastic reception. The pictures will be shown at Keith's Cincinnati theater, as well as at Portsmouth houses, and some, in fact, have already appeared at the Exhibit theater, of the latter place, meeting with considerable interest on the part of local audiences.

R. H. Haynes, who has been for some months connected with the Cincinnati office of the Mutual Film Company as assistant to Manager C. C. Hite, left the Queen City last week to assume his duties as manager of the new Louisville office of the company. His promotion was a recognition of considerable ability shown in exchange work, and his colleagues in Cincinnati gave him a good send-off, although they regretted his departure. CASEY.

KENTUCKY.

DESPITE the fact that the coldest fall weather experienced in thirty years has settled over Louisville during November, the moving picture houses have been drawing exceptionally good crowds. Sunday night business is improving steadily and numbers are now attending moving picture shows on Sunday who would have shied at the idea a year or so ago. Local film men claim that high-class, clean productions are changing the public attitude greatly toward the moving picture houses.

Frank E. Hammar, who has been in charge of the Louisville office of the Mutual Film Corporation, has resigned his position with the company, and returned to Indianapolis. He has several plans under consideration, but has not decided as to what he will go into so far. He said he would certainly follow the moving picture business as he is a film man, first, last and all the time.

R. H. Haines, formerly assistant manager of the Cincinnati office of the Mutual Film Corporation, has been assigned to management of the Louisville office to succeed Frank E. Hammer. He is busy at present getting the lay of the land.

It is reported that the managements of the Olio and Ruby theaters, two colored motion picture houses on Walnut street, Louisville, are considering a new house, to be opened at Tenth and Chestnut streets, in the heart of a thickly-populated negro district. Moving pictures are steadily gaining in pouplarity with the negroes and several houses are now operated for colored people.

The S. & P. Film & Supply Company, Louisville, put seven road shows in operation out in the state Thanksgiving Day. These shows played in isolated districts or towns which do not boast of moving picture houses. Two exhibitions were given at each stop, a matinee and an evening show. The venture was very successful. In some districts the farmers and country people came in from quite a distance to see the special programs which were shown.

George Huffman, of the New York office of the Warner Feature Film Corporation, has arrived in Louisville and has taken charge of the local office of the company. Mr. Huffman will handle Falls City bookings and J. J. Hebbert, who has been handling the city work, will again go on the road. Hr. Hebbert has been anxious for some time past to get back to the road.

David Levenson, manager and proprietor of the Novelty theater, Louisville, lost his mother, Mrs. Theresa Levenson, who died at the age of 85, at the home of her daughter at Lafayette, Ind., on November 18. Mr. Levenson made the trip to Lafayette and later to Cincinnati, where the body was interred.

The Hippodrome theater, at Second and Market streets, Louisville, has just installed a new $1,500 Wurlitzer orchestra. This theater has been drawing remarkably well since the Hopkins theater burned some months ago. The two theaters were located almost directly across the street from one another.

Gerald Wagner, of the Box Office Attraction Company and the Greater New York Film Rental Company, was recently in Louisville from the St. Louis office of the concern. He reports easy bookings on late William Fox features.

Carpenter & Johnson, Louisville motion picture photographers, recently completed a reel of film of Jeffersonville, Ind., for use in Jeffersonville motion picture houses. The film showed street scenes and a number of industrial plants. Ernest Carpenter reports that film making is very quiet just now as industrial concerns are curtailing as much as possible on account of the European war.

J. J. Hebbert, of the Warner Feature Film Company, Louisville, has just returned from a short trip to the Central part of the state. He reports country business excellent this season and city contracts holding up well.

R. L. Martin, proprietor of a motion picture house at Springfield, Ky., was recently in Louisville for a day or so looking for supplies for his motion picture house. He has been very successful in his showing of the "Million Dollar Mystery."

H. V. Conlon, secretary of the Louisville Motion Picture Operators' Union, announces that they now have thirty-three paid up members on their list and are making some headway with non-union members. The organization holds two meetings monthly at Liederkranz hall, on the first and third Thursdays. At a recent meeting officers were nominated and the annual election will be held shortly.

The Walnut theater, of Louisville, on a number of occasions has mailed out coupons to persons who, upon filling in their names and addresses, and those of their guests, were admitted to the theatre free of charge. In this way a mailing list of persons interested in motion picture shows has been gained and the theater mails out an advance notice each week describing briefly the special feature which will be shown. The theater has been showing a number of the big Brady and Shubert productions during the past few weeks.

J. G. Connor, of the Indianapolis office of the Thanhouser Film Corporation, was recently in Louisville looking after the contest in connection with the solution of the "Million Dollar Mystery," and also making bookings for the company's new serial production of "Zudora," for which eighteen local moving picture houses have contracted, according to Mr. Connor. He also made arrangements with the Louisville Times, one of the leading newspapers, to run the serial story simultaneously with the pictures. The first house to start off the serial was the Walnut theater, which had just wound up with the "Million Dollar Mystery." Mr. Connor formerly lived in Louisville and New Albany and called on a number of old friends.

Announcement has been made by the Majestic Amusement Company, of Louisville, that the Essanay productions of Francis X. Bushman, will constitute its Sunday features hereafter. "In the Glare of the Lights" was shown to a packed house on Sunday, November 22. This production has gained such a national reputation that no trouble whatsoever was experienced in getting a good crowd.

J. Koenigstein, who operates a big general store at Eminence, Ky., has been delayed considerably in opening his new motion picture house, which will take up a portion of his big store building. It was found that the center beams in the building would not support the great weight, and when almost completed steel beams had to be put in to replace the wooden ones. The house will have 450 seats when completed.

George Sharp, of Liberty, Ky., has sold his motion picture show to L. W. Cuniff and R. M. Carpenter, who will continue to operate it. Some improvements are contemplated in the house.

Chris Sidiris, of Winchester, Ky., has leased for a term of fifteen years a vacant store room in the Fraternity building and will remodel it for a motion picture theater. The new house will be ready for business about January 1.

The Louisville & Nashville Railroad put on a special train on Thanksgiving Day from the Mingo Mines, at Mingo Hollow, Ky., to Middlesboro, Ky., so that the miners could return to their homes at 10.30 in the evening after the last show at the Manring theater. Manager Brown had the big feature "From the Manger to the Cross" as a special Thanksgiving offering. Besides the miners, people came in from a distance of twenty miles to see the big play, and the house had considerable difficulty in handling the crowd.

On motion of Walter Hunt, of Lexington, Ky., Commissioner of Public Safety, the commissioners directed Mr. Hunt to address a letter to all proprietors of motion picture houses asking them to refuse admission to children under fifteen years of age, unless accompanied by a parent or guardian or other person having legal care or custody of the child, after 8 o'clock in the evening. The matter was brought before the commissioners by Chief Probation Officer Henry L. Ramsay, of the Juvenile Court, who stated that if such action could be brought about it would greatly facilitate enforcement of the curfew ordinance. Mr. Ramsey said that children who entered the moving picture shows previous to 8 o'clock and left after that hour would be permitted to go home, but the purpose of the action was to prevent young girls unattended by their parents or guardians from frequenting the picture houses.

KANSAS

RECENTLY the Gem theater at Eldora, Kan., showed the films owned by the International Harvester Company illustrating the evolution from the reaping hook to the present day harvester. Films showing a fifty-five bottom plow were also shown. Commercial films of this sort are being shown more and more in the country towns and are the source of considerable interest as well as advertising.

The Hip theater at Topeka, Kan., closed its popular vote contest November 19 by giving Mrs. Myrtle B. Hoover a Maxwell motorcar and giving Sherwood E. Willicuts a diamond ring. Willicuts immediately filed suit in the court of Topeka against the Crawfords, managers of the theater, E. S. Bilveal, contest manager, and D. C. Pratt and E. W. Turner, promoters of the contest, claiming a breach of contract with him, as one of the contestants. Willicuts asks $50 for labor in the contest, $50 attorney's fees, $15 costs and $75 exemplary damages.

The Esbon Opera House displayed the films owned by the University of Kansas recently. These films show various phases of commercial activity as well as teach lessons in citizenship. Among the titles of the pictures were "A Crime of Carelessness," "An American in the Making" and "The Man He Might Have Been." Besides these subjects there were pictures of the making of good roads and the making of breakfast foods. These pictures were shown in connection with the regular program and an admission fee of ten cents was charged.

The Pastime theater at Medicine Lodge, Kan., gave the entire receipts of its evening performance November 17 to the Belgian relief fund.

For several months the theaters of Kansas have closed on Sunday, obeying a statute to that effect. However, now comes R. A. Williams of Pittsburg, Kan., and announces that he will open the Pittsburg moving picture theater every Sunday and, furthermore, the Sunday closing law does not apply to him. Here's the reason—Mr. Williams is a Seventh Day Adventist, and observes Saturday as the Sabbath, and on that ground he claims that he can do anything he wants to on Sunday. There seems to be a clause in the Kansas statutes which provides that the Seventh Day Adventists be allowed, by reason of their religion, to do things on Sunday that others are not; but whether it can be carried as far as Mr. Williams intends to, is a question.

The Westinghouse moving pictures illustrating the advantages of electric cooking and household apparatus, the title of which is "Mrs. Thrifty," are being shown in fourteen picture houses in Kansas City, Kan., the last weeks of November. This period marks the opening of the electric store in Kansas City city hall, the municipality being a vender of current for domestic and industrial uses. Heretofore there has been no central store for supplying electric equipment, but the city has been adding very largely to its number of consumers. Now that there is a municipal store, the most effective means has been taken to stimulate interest in electricity—these attractive pictures put before the wideawake people of the communities.

Slides bearing the plea to respond to the appeals for aiding Bethany hospital are to be displayed in practically all the pictures show houses of Kansas City, Kan., this week and next. The slides bear interesting drawings and pictures, besides the wording which inspires the generous inclinations of the spectators.

The Theater Fresno, Fresno, Cal., is now being devoted to vaudeville performances, with moving pictures forming a part of the bill.

D. S. Taylor has purchased a lot on K street, Tulare, Cal., and will erect a moving picture theater at a cost of $20,000. The house will have a seating capacity of 600.

"Neptune's Daughter" has been enjoying a wonderful run at Los Angeles, Cal., and is now booked at the Garrick theater for six consecutive weeks, after having been shown there for a week two different times.

Fred Geisea, of the MacDonough theater, Oakland, Cal., and representative of the John Cort Circuit, is arranging to place in operation a central booking agency for the benefit of exhibitors outside of San Francisco. A number of attraction houses throughout the Sacramento and San Joaquin Valleys are already in line for the service and others will probably be added later. According to present plans, this booking bureau will be in charge of Mr. Benjamin, formerly manager of the Victory theater, San Jose, Cal.

Arrangements have been completed to open the new T. & D. Berkeley theater at Berkeley, Cal., on the evening of December 9, the opening attraction to be "Cabiria." This will be followed by the "Hoosier Schoolmaster" and the opening week will be rounded out by "Neptune's Daughter."

Charles H. Thomas is preparing to erect a new moving picture theater on Main street, Roseville, Cal., the house to have a capacity of 500.

Murphy & Klas have closed the Viola theater, Hollister, Cal., after having conducted it for one week.

The Home theater, Oakland, Cal., has been sold by A. B. Ausland to Farlow & Rollins. It is located on Thirteenth avenue, near East Fourteenth street.

The Broadway theater, Chico, Cal., recently showed pictures of Chico and vicinity, including lumbering scenes in the mountains. The proceeds of the show were turned over to the Development Committee of the Chico Business Men's Association, under whose auspices it was given. A special orchestra and women ushers were some of the features out of the ordinary.

Arthur Wenzel, treasurer and assistant manager of the Macdonough theater, Oakland, Cal., was married in that city this week to Miss Nellie Barton, assistant treasurer of the theater.

George S. Duke, secretary of the United States Feature Film Company of Oroville, Cal., recently made a trip to Los Angeles to confer with Director Newman. A developing plant will be installed shortly at the studio.

L. V. DeLorme, for some time manager of the New Alameda theater of Turner & Dahnken at Alameda, Cal., has been transferred to the Richmond theater and Joseph Langley of the Richmond house will take charge of the Alameda playhouse.

A moving picture theater is being erected at Albany, Cal., by the principal of the school and associates. This theater is of frame construction and the permit runs for but one year, it being the intention to erect a permanent house later on.

The Alpha theater at Seventy-second avenue and East Fourteenth street, Oakland, Cal., has been reopened.

The Randolph Feature Film Corporation has secured a site for a studio at Stockton, Cal., and plans are now being prepared for a plant by Architect W. B. Thomas. O. E. Cook is secretary of the company and John Gale is sales manager.

CHURCH.

ST. LOUIS.

THE Carroll theater, 1500 South Broadway, has raised admission prices from five cents to ten cents on Sunday, when a six-reel program is given. The price for the balance of the week stands at four reels for five cents.

Mrs. F. L. Root, manager of the Eagle theater at 1717 South Broadway, established a record for attendance on Sunday, November 15, which is remarkable. The Eagle, which is one of the smallest theaters in the city, has only 178 seats, and during the afternoon and evening of the day in question the box office showed $87 in paid admissions. This at five cents a head means that 1,740 persons visited the show that day, and $45 of the amount, or nine hundred admissions, were taken in from seven to nine-thirty in the evening. The new theater which Mrs. Root is building next door to her present house, will seat 500 patrons, and is to be one of the finest theaters in South Broadway. The new Eagle will be fireproof throughout, and will be equipped with all of the latest improvements, including sanitary drinking fountains and modern ventilating system.

When F. J. Wolf, manager of the Iola theater, at 2728 Lafayette avenue, opened his theater, which is on the ground floor of the building formerly used as the Owl Club House, he was confronted with a peculiar projection problem. There was no place for a machine at the front of the room, and a booth had to be built at the side of the auditorium of the theater, more than half way to the screen. The picture is projected at an angle with a very short throw. An Edison machine is used, and clear pictures are obtained with no distortion or flicker.

G. Chiaple has bought the Coliseum theater, at 1219 South Broadway, from Alex Papadricos, the former proprietor. Mr. Chiaple is giving his patrons a four-reel Universal program for five cents.

The Yale theater, at Winnebago and Minnesota avenues, is a happy departure in point of architecture from the ordinary moving picture playhouse. The building is in a residence neighborhood with no other business houses near where the ordinary square front of glaring white brick or tile would be incongruous and out of place. The builders evidently took this into consideration and a building in keeping with its surroundings was constructed. A very striking feature of the Yale is its entrance and lobby, which is in the shape of a narthex, or tetrastyle portico. The spaces between the columns are filled in with glass with doors on all three sides. The exterior of the building, and particularly the roof and upper facades, are of striking design, and finished in composite Roman and Ionic architectural trimmings. Altogether, the building is a positive ornament to the neighborhood. The Yale was opened in June, and has been playing to pleasing business ever since. The theater seats 618 and is under the management of A. Seitrich.

Moving pictures furnished a program at the Markham Institutional Church on the night of November 16. The regular congregation of the church and Sunday school were shown films depicting the activities of the Vacation Bible Classes of the last summer, and many interesting views of the Children's Industrial Farm at Eureka, Mo. An address and a lecture were delivered as an accompaniment to the moving pictures by Hon. Frank Wyman, former postmaster of St. Louis, and a leader in church and sociological work.

H. Steinmeyer, manager and proprietor of the Chippewa theater, at 3807 South Broadway, is managing his theater on a policy that it would be wise for a great many other exhibitors to follow. When his house was first opened ten cents admission was charged, but with the coming of a great number of shows in the neighborhood came cut-throat competition and the prices were forced down to five cents. This was three years ago. Now there is a tendency among the people in the neighborhood which indicates that they would rather see four or five reels of good pictures and pay ten cents for the entertainment than to get the usual six and seven reels of rain-stormy junk that the cheap place must naturally furnish. Steinmeyer saw this return to saneness on the part of his audience, and profited by it. First, he made the people understand that his program would always be the same high standard, then he began raising his prices, first on holidays, then on Sundays, and whenever he has a special feature. The people come just the same, they fill the six hundred seats and stand up in the aisles for ten cents just as easy on Sundays as they do for five cents on week days, and it will only be a short time until the theater will be back on a ten-cent basis with not a lost patron.

Mrs. L. B. Stoddard, who operates the Monroe theater at 2816 Chippewa street, claims the distinction of being the only woman operator in St. Louis. She operated her own machine, and sucessfully, for a period of seven months, and would be doing it yet if the Operators' Union would have granted her a license. Mrs. Stoddard says she can run a projecting machine as good as any one, and with that end in view she presented herself to the examining committee of the union, but she was given a polite refusal, and she has to content herself with managing the downstairs part of her show. The Monroe is one of the pioneer theaters on the south side, and while its seating capacity is small, it is a very popular place, and is thriving under the management of Mrs. Stoddard. A five-reel program is given for five cents admission.

"Get into the movies with the Giddings" was the caption of an invitation issued by the Giddings Brotherhood Bible Class of the First Presbyterian Church, at Washington avenue and Sarah street. This invitation is followed by the announcement that the Giddings Brotherhood Bible Class will gather at their church and march in a body to the Second Baptist Church, where a union service of the two classes will be held, followed by a program which will be presided over by George P. Knox, Assistant Superintendent of Education. The Giddings are composed of fifty well-known men who have been for several years active in local philanthropic work. Their march will be filmed and shown in the "St. Louis in the Movies" films, which are shown at local theaters every week.

GIEBLER.

INDIANA.

THE Theatorium, Newcastle, Ind., under the management of Leslie Bell for several months, has been sold to Eldon Downs, of Springport. Downs will have personal charge of his new venture.

Manager Metzger booked Rainey's "African Hunt" as the first of a series of feature films he expects to run at the New Fairy theater, Knox, Ind. He is charging 15 cents on the "big" nights.

Ed. F. Galligan has returned to the management of the Wilson theater, Loganport, Ind., after an absence of three months in Louisville, where he went to manage the Masonic theater. Chas. L. Fallon, who has been managing the Wilson during Mr. Galligan's absence, will leave Logansport. He has a number of offers but has not decided which to accept.

The West Hammond, Ind., board of education has purchased an Atlas portable moving picture machine for use in the schools. Supt. Deaveer proposes to use the machine in connection with educational pictures once or twice a week.

The Zaring-Rhodes Amusement Company, Indianapolis, is putting on some unusual bills at each of their four theaters. It is only a question of time until they will be running all feature bills at each house.

R. Rohr, manager of the Photo-Play theater, Kouts, Ind., has leased the Kouts store building and will move into the new quarters. Manager Rohr's house is a ten-cent house.

Allardt Brothers, Kokomo, Ind., are to build a $45,000 theater April 1, next year. M. F. Gilmore, fiscal agent, states that the building is to be three stories high, and at least a portion of it let for office use. The house is to be used for vaudeville and moving pictures.

Clarence Fall, Frankfort, Ind., according to a report from Frankfort, has leased a picture house at 3005 East Washington street, Indianapolis, and will open soon.

Manager Abe Gumbiner, of the DeLuxe theater, Hammond, Ind., is setting a pace. He is showing six features a week regularly.

Arrangements are being completed by the Indiana Union at Indiana University, Bloomington, Ind., to give a "movie opening" the night the new picture machine is put in service. Earl Moore, a student, is wiring the booth and will operate the machine.

Indianapolis exhibitors propose to protest against the Federal tax against picture houses on the ground that they should not be classed with legitimate theaters. If the tax prevails they hold it should be readjusted to make it lighter.

R. L. JENNE.

DETROIT.

THE writer dropped into a leading "Business Exchange" place in Detroit where dozens of business places are changing hands daily, and asked whether they had many transfers on moving picture theaters. "No, we don't get very many," was the reply. "We have more inquiries than we can handle. It is surprising the number of people who want to get into the business, and who are on the lookout for houses that are paying." An investigation made of general business conditions with the picture houses the past few weeks discloses the fact that the outskirt houses are enjoying a good business, while some of the downtown houses are suffering a slight falling off in trade. Take the new Alhambra out at Woodward and Kenilworth avenues, about four miles from the city, this house seats 1,500 persons and is crowding them twice nightly; take the Gladwin, at Jefferson avenue and the Water Works Park, a similar condition of affairs exists there. Many of the factories are closed down, and the men do not wander downtown as they have in the past, but remain close at home, and patronize their neighborhood houses. But business with the outskirt houses is bound to improve as time goes on. In practically every section of the town, new houses are springing up, and inside of another twelve months six large houses with a seating capacity of over a thousand each will have been erected in Detroit, all outside of the mile radius, and most of them two miles.

The Columbia theater on Monroe avenue is now changing its pictures twice a week, with the regular shift of the vaudeville bills. As extra attractions, the Ford Weekly is shown on Tuesdays and Wednesdays, and the Strand War Series on Thursdays and Fridays. These are in addition to the pictures, which open and close each show.

Starting Monday, November 30, the Orpheum theater, which plays Pantages vaudeville, inaugurated the same policy of pictures as the Miles. That is, two hours of pictures precedes the regular vaudeville programme at 2.30, giving the public pictures from 12.30 until 2.30 for the one admission price. People who come any time after 12.30 can remain over for both the two hours of pictures and the vaudeville show. H. P. Williamson is manager of the Orpheum.

The new William Penn theater, at Woodward and Philadelphia avenues, will be opened early in December, and the manager will be Eddie Murphy, for three years assistant manager of the Columbia, and who recently signed to take the management of the Bijou in Saginaw. The opportunity to return to Detroit as a real manager was too tempting despite the fact that he had a good opportunity in Saginaw.

W. H. Smith, who has been acting as assistant manager of the New Empire on Woodward avenue, has been advanced to the position of manager, succeeding B. Harlan Starr, who has just resigned. T. J. McCarron, son of J. H. McCarron, manager of the Family theater, will be Mr. Smith's assistant. Mr. Smith came to the Empire some months ago from Albany. While a young man, he has had experience in every department of the theatrical and moving picture business, and he will prove an excellent successor to Mr. Starr, who managed the Empire since it opened. Mr. Starr is not ready to announce his future plans. Immediately upon resigning from the Empire, he received an offer from Mr. Blanck Meyer to help him for several weeks, but since then he has received another flattering offer from one of the downtown picture houses, and negotiations are now pending which will probably result in his taking the position as manager.

The Addison theater, at Woodward and Watson streets, opposite the Hotel Addison, is doing a business that is an absolute surprise to its proprietor, C. A. Pudrith, and its manager, Charles Graham. From the time the doors were opened in the evening to the last show, there is a demand for seats and business is constantly improving. It is reported that since the house opened, only a few months ago, it has paid back 60-cent dividends to the stockholders.

George H. Weeks, manager of the Detroit Universal Film Company, has just received a supply of the famous menicus-bi-convex condensers. These condensers are taking Detroit by storm and operators report that they are all that the Laemmle Film Company claim for them.

After December 13 the National theater will give up vaudeville entirely and the house, until further notice, will play musical tabloids. However, Manager Hagedorn says pictures will remain; they will be used between each show as they have in the past. "People who come here demand at least some pictures and no matter what the other attraction may be, they don't want to go without pictures entirely," he said.

E. H. Newman completed his series of Travel Talks at the Detroit Opera House Sunday night, November 22, when he showed pictures of Berlin, both still and in motion.

The law is again conflicting with the good work of the motion picture industry. This time it is in connection with the Safety First campaign and the Detroit Board of Commerce. The Board wants to start an education campaign on Safety First by showing motion pictures; the auditorium is on the second floor, although there is a law specifying that no motion pictures depending on celluloid films can be shown in any building above the first floor. However, it is believed that the state officials will make a concession in this case when the fireproof construction of the Board of Commerce building is made known, together with the thorough precautions, such as fire escapes and other safety devices, which the designers of the structure have provided.

In the program of the Garden theater for the week of November 23 the following announcement is made: "Consistent with his policy of furnishing only the best musical accompaniment for the photoplay entertainments in the several Detroit theaters controlled by him, John H. Kunsky has this week placed an order for a beautiful two-manuel pipe organ which will contain in the neighborhood of twenty stops, including a set of cathedral chimes and other novel features." The Garden is under the management of Arthur C. Hoganson, and is offering as attractive a program as it is possible to secure. Look at this for the week of November 23: Monday, Ethel Barrymore in "The Nightingale"; Tuesday, Edward Abeles in "Ready Money"; Wednesday, Evelyn Nesbit Thaw in "Threads of Destiny"; Thursday, John Barrymore in "The Man from Mexico"; Friday, Alice Joyce in "The Theft of the Crown Jewels," and an extra Vitagraph comedy, as well as two other good reels; Saturday, three interesting pictures, with the Hearst-Selig pictorial, and on Sunday, Adda Gleason in a two-part Selig melo-drama, "Out of Petticoat Lane," an Essanay, a Kalem comedy, an Edison drama and the Ford Weekly.

Collector of Internal Revenue James J. Brady states that there are still a number of picture proprietors who have failed to pay their share of the deficiency tax, although the tax should have been paid before November 30.

The Pulaski theater building in course of erection at West Jefferson and Pulaski street, is well under way and will be completed early next year. The structure contains the theater, stores and flats, and will cost $60,000. The owner is John Kaczur. The theater proper faces West Jefferson avenue.

The new theater being erected at Woodward and Harper avenues is owned by Alvin D. Hirsch, attorney in the Majestic building, and will seat around 350.

The Delray house of William F. Klatt has been sold to Messrs. Cohen and King.

All arrangements have about been completed for the censoring of pictures by the child welfare and civic committees of the Federation of Women's Clubs in Detroit. At a meeting November 20 it was decided to immediately carry out a program of visiting the motion picture shows with the object of detecting undesirable films and have them eliminated by the police department. Thirty women comprise these committees, they propose to publish the title of the undesirable film, but not the name of the theater. They say they are not out to kill the motion picture as a means of entertainment, but to endeavor to protect the public, particularly the young minds, against suggestive pictures. "Though there is a decided need for a censorship, an indiscriminate censorship would be unwise," said the chairman of both committees.

A feature of a dinner given recently by the men of the North Congregational church was the appointment of a committee to ask all north-end picture theaters to give, on Friday and Saturday evenings, when many of the patrons are children, entertainments free from heavy drama or other material unsuited to young minds. Other churches in the district will be asked to join in the request.

The Chicago Tribune European war pictures will be shown at the Broadway theater for a week, beginning Sunday, December 8. Fifty per cent. of the profits will be turned over to the Belgian Red Cross fund. The pictures shown are shown by permission of the Belgian government.

John H. Kunsky, proprietor of the Garden theater, has donated the proceeds of the afternoon's performance, November 23, to the housing reform committee of the Twentieth Century Club. Ethel Barrymore, in "The Nightingale," was the picture shown.

Another new theater to open in Detroit and located in the residential district, is the Coliseum, at Greenwood avenue and Canfield. The owners are Ben and Lew Cohen, who also operate the Colonial on Gratiot avenue. The architect was C. Howard Crane, in the Dime Savings Bank building. The house will seat 600 comfortably. The building is of brick, concrete and steel, about 60 by 90 feet in size; with property and furnishings cost $35,000. A feature of the house is a special part of the lobby devoted to baby carriages, and a $5,000 Wurlitzer organ. Pictures are changed daily, and will be the same as are shown at the New Empire on Woodward avenue. In other words, the Coliseum will get the pictures a day or two after they are shown at the Empire. The admission price is ten cents for all performances. No mattinees are given except on Saturday, Sunday and holidays. The theater throughout is plain, and yet the decorations are tasty and along well defined lines. The operator's booth is one of the very best in the city, having running water, alternating and direct current, Wagner dynamo, a transformer and equipped with two Powers 6A machines. The size of the room is 20 feet wide, 12 feet high and about eight feet deep. On Saturday, November 21, the Coliseum showed "Paul Revere's Ride." Circulars were distributed among the children at all of the nearby schools, and the crowd that came to see this picture was larger than the theater could hold. The entire classes of some schools came accompanied by their teachers. Recently Ben and Lew Cohen called at the Brown-Leuven Hospital for Crippled Children and took a dozen of the children in automobiles to their theater and gave a special performance for them. They plan to entertain the balance of the children before the first of the New Year.

SMITH.

MICHIGAN.

A. J. HICKS has taken over the management of the Gem theater at St. Johns, succeeding E. E. Cranston. No vaudeville will be used; the house will be operated at a five-cent photoplay theater. Occasionally a feature film will be run at ten cents. Mrs. Hicks will be pianist.

M. W. Jopling was ill and was not able to be at the opening of his new Delft theater in Escanaba. He was represented by H. S. Gallup, general manager of his company.

The new Eagle moving picture theater on Granville avenue in Grand Rapids has been opened.

The Y. M. C. A. at Cadillac was given a benefit show at the Star theater.

Charles Russel has sold the Gem and Electric theaters at Manistee to Charles Christiansen and sons, Frank and Allen. Mr. Russell, who has been in ill-health, will spend the winter in the west.

The jury in the cast to test the censorship ordinance at Holland disagreed. Manager J. W. Heimbaugh of the Royal theater was charged by Censor Mrs. G. E. Kollen with having run a picture after she had ordered it stopped. Her objection was to a scene "The Tragedy of Whispering Creek," showing a man being pushed over the cliff.

The new Aladdin theater at Bay City announces that so many different sorts of pictures will be shown at that house that even the mose cynical moving picture devotee will be entertained.

The Bay City Stone Company of Bay City is erecting for itself at Woodside and Belinda streets, in Bay City, a brick and stone, one-story, 40x100, moving picture theater, seating 350. It will cost about $6,000.

Rev. Eli Phelps Bennett, pastor of the First Methodist Episcopal Church in Saginaw, took a novel method of expressing to the members of his congregation his wish that moving pictures be adopted for use in connection with the church work. He secured a lecturer on "Siberia, Russia and Tolstoi," hoping that the demonstration of the moving pictures for such educational purposes would lead to their adoption by the church.

WISCONSIN.

THE Empire theater at Chippewa Falls recently celebrated its fourth anniversary week.

The Lyric theater at Chippewa Falls has adopted a policy of a straight ten-cent admission, with the exception that children may attend the matinees for five cents.

The chief of police in Monroe had a traffic problem when the initial showing of "Zudora" was made at the Monroe theater. The street was filled.

The management of the Opera House at Montello is using a four-piece orchestra in connection with its Saturday night exhibitions of "The Trey o' Hearts."

William Merz of Chilton has been preparing to open a moving picture show at New London.

Frank Goold has purchased a building at Montfort and is remodeling it for use as a moving picture theater.

Roy Campbell of Werley has leased the Crystal theater at Boscobel.

Manager Charles Frellson of the Unique theater at Waukesha had a reel of pictures made of the Carroll-Ripon football game.

Moving picture managers of Milwaukee selected George Fischer of the Alhambra theater as their representative upon the public safety commission of that city. He was placed upon the commitee on education and is doing some good work in promoting the use of slides telling the public how to prevent and avoid accidents. The request of the commission that the exhibitors be represented on the board is evidence of the recognition of the educational qualities of the moving picture theater.

Simplex

Simplex | DESIGN WORKMANSHIP PROJECTION UPKEEP | Peerless

Safety First:

In the Simplex machine are embodied ideal fire protection devices. The film guards are not removable, but are a part of the mechanism proper. The automatic fire shutter is operated by a centrifugal governor and opens when the machine is run at normal speed. The shutter operates by gravity. There are no springs, leather shoes or other parts to cause friction or strain upon the operation of the machine, thus insuring positive operation.

Enclosed Mechanism:

The gears of the Simplex machine are enclosed, thereby protecting them from dust and foreign matter and obviating the possibility of anything accidentally coming in contact therewith. The Simplex is silent in operation.

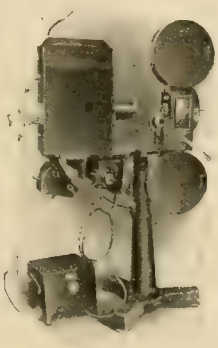
The film while being projected is not only protected from heat by the cooling plate, and from fire by the reliable auto-fire shutter, film guards and the light shield, also top and bottom magazine valves and the enclosed machanism, but is protected from dust by being entirely enclosed. Some manufacturers may tell you that dust is not injurious to film or machinery. Look at a small quantity through a microscope and convince yourself.

Framing Device:

The framing of a picture on Simplex machines is scientifically accomplished by advancing or retarding the intermittent movement. This is an exclusive feature, and insures the operator that both the feed and intermittent sprockets are always in line and the chances of losing the lower loop by jerking the film down or when framing up, (which causes it to buckle with ordinary devices), are entirely eliminated.

Adjustable Revolving Shutter:

This is another feature to be found only on the Simplex projector, and insures the operator that when taking his machine apart or putting on a shutter, he can set it in time with the movement of the Geneva absolutely accurate while the machine is in operation. The shutter is automatically timed when the framing device is rotated.



When an Exhibitor desires the last word in Motion Picture Machine Construction, and considers Quality and the Low Cost of Upkeep, Simplex is invariably selected.

Used exclusively by the world's largest Photoplay Theatre—Strand, New York.

Catalogue A explains why Simplex projection cannot be successfully imitated. Read our ad in the next issue.

PHILADELPHIA.

THE first move in the state-wide fight of motion picture exhibitors against the Pennsylvania censorship law was made on Monday, Nov. 30, when a delegation representing the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Pennsylvania called upon United States Senator Boies Penrose at his offices in the Commercial Trust Building, Philadelphia, Pa., and sought his influence in their efforts to have the act repealed. He promised aid in their efforts in that direction and he also promised to help them in having the building laws governing theaters modified and the changing of taxation in the industry.

The spokesman of the delegation told Senator Penrose that the censorship act was so constructed that it permitted all sorts of hardships to be imposed on the film producers and allowed the censor to say whether display posters would be permitted outside the theaters. The picture men said they were compelled to pay for the inspection of duplicate films and that the city, state and federal tax, together with the censor fees, prevented them from securing a reasonable return on their investment.

At the conclusion of the delegation's remarks, Senator Penrose said: "I am impressed with your arguments and I have found that there are many objections to the law. It is loosely worded and permits the censor to take great liberties and I shall be glad to co-operate with you for more fair legislation." Senator Penrose urged the delegation to see the members of the Legislature from these districts and secure their support.

State Senator Joseph H. Thompson of Beaver county, who obtained the audience for the delegation, came out flatfooted for the repeal of the act. "We want this bill repealed and we want you to help us," said Senator Thompson. "When this bill was passed the moving picture men were caught napping, but I will promise you it will never happen again, and henceforth they will have a Legislative Committee at Harrisburg." Senator Penrose told Senator Thompson that they should consider deeply whether the present law should be repealed, without having some constructive legislation to follow it up.

P. Cropper, business manager of the Exhibitors' League, acted as chairman of the delegation, which numbered representatives from every section of the state. Morris Speirs, of Philadelphia, said that the censor's fee worked a financial hardship and meant ruination for the producer and the exhibitor.

According to figures gathered together by V. R. Carrick, of the Interstate Film Company, Philadelphia, the fees of the censor would average $30,000 annually. He said that the censorship commission now averages 233 reels a week at $2.50 a reel. Mr. Carrick said the most unjust feature of the law was that there is a charge of $2.50 for all duplicates as well as the original subjects. He declared further that he had paid $2,627 to date, in addition to a Federal tax of $600, and that in his opinion the public should be the censor.

Senator Penrose interrupted him to say that he could see no legitimate reason for a charge on duplicate pictures. "That," he declared, "is carrying the matter a little too far."

George Leavitt, representing a New York house, said that all films sent out by his company were censored in New York, yet they were made to go through the same process here, and he declared if this kept up his firm would be unable to do business in Pennsylvania. Frederick Herrington, president of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association of Pennsylvania, told Senator Penrose that additional hardships were coming for the moving picture trade in the shape of more stringent building laws, that he said were contemplated at the next session of the Legislature.

The workings of the National Board of Censorship was explained by J. H. Butner, manager of the Mutual Film Exchange, and he declared that 96 per cent. of all the films exhibited were inspected by this board. He was followed by Zerr, of Reading, who asserted that 75 per cent. of the moving picture houses in the state were losing money every day they opened because of the restrictions placed upon them. While discussing the war tax, Senator Penrose told Mr. Zerr to watch out or he could get another tax within the next few months by the Democratic Administration.

The question of the right of I. Louis Breitinger to serve as State censor arose during the meeting and it developed that the bill was passed during the 1911 session of the Legislature, when Breitinger was a member of the House of Representatives and voted upon the bill. If this is true, Senator Penrose told the delegation, Mr. Breitinger is not qualified to hold the position.

Pittsburgh Local No. 1, of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association of Pennsylvania, has sent out circulars to movie men throughout the state, requesting them to attend a convention to be held in Harrisburg, Pa., Jan. 4, 5 and 6 for the purpose of forming a state-wide organization of motion picture exhibitors. Fred J. Herrington, president of the association, is at Harrisburg arranging the preliminaries of the convention to which members of both the association and the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League, as well as independent exhibitors, will be invited. It is the purpose to form the Pennsylvania league of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, of which Marion S. Pierce, of Baltimore, is president. The state branch, it is reported, will seek the repeal of the recently enacted censorship law in Pennsylvania and take an active part in fighting for the exhibitors' interest in the Legislature and elsewhere.

What is said to be one of the most beautiful moving picture houses in the eastern part of Pennsylvania was opened recently. It is located at 425-27-29 Tilghman street, Allentown, Pa. Frank F. With the opening of the Franklin theater, there are now eleven motion picture houses in Allentown.

The motion pictures of Northampton, which were taken by the Beaner Special Film Company and which were shown at the Lyric theater, where they attracted much attention, were also shown at the Arcade theater of Cementon. The pictures deal with the factories, churches, school houses, fire companies and numerous other features of the town.

The moving picture theater at 2236-38 North Front street, known as the Crystal theater, has been rented to Howard L. Adams.

Joseph Frocca, well known among local moving picture interests, has had plans and specifications prepared for a motion picture theater to be erected at 4949-53 Lancaster avenue. It will be one story, of brick, and measuring 40 by 85 feet.

At a meeting of the Bucks County Federation of Women's Clubs in the Doylestown Presbyterian Church, Mrs. Falconer, head of the girls department of the Glen Mills Schools, stated that well selected moving pictures were a wonderful source of character molding among children and that she considered a manager of a picture theatre, who exhibits good clean cut pictures, a public benefactor.

The industries of the State of Delaware will be shown in moving pictures at the Panama-Pacific International Exposition. Visitors to the Exposition will be able to make a side trip to Delaware in a few minutes, merely by stepping into the Delaware building, where pictures showing the industries, resources and natural wonders of the State will be shown free of charge. The manufacture of kaolin and its products, the production of corn, grain, fruit and potatoes, the operation of the evaporators and the canneries, the shipment of oysters, the manufacture of gunpowder paper and woolen goods are some of the wonders which Delaware has to present on the screen.

On the seventeenth of this month the Academy of Music was the scene of remarkable moving pictures on animal life. The pictures were made by Dr. Raymond L. Ditmars, curator of the New York Bronx Zoo. Dr. Ditmars accompanies his showing of this living book of nature with an interesting running commentary which was highly illuminative and interesting.

Contract was awarded to Louis Ahlen, Jr., for a new picture house at Rising Sun avenue and Louden street, at a cost of $7,000. Mr. Ahlen resides at 4433 Salmon street.

The management of the Grand Theatre of Reading, Pa., announces that they will reopen this month with moving pictures.

A series of moving pictures have been arrainged at the Commercial Museum of Philadelphia as a means of teaching geography to the school children. China, Alaska, Greece and Persia were visited by the children in company with the cameraman. These travels will be continued on succeeding Saturdays.

Frank B. Hall and Geoffrey Konta have been admitted to the directorate of the World Film Corporation, thus increasing the number of members to sixteen. Philadelphia capitol is largely interested in this corporation.

Moving pictures were shown in the Lyceum Theater, Pittsburgh, Sunday, November 29th, and the police failed to move against the ones in charge of them. The police stated: "We shall cross no bridges until we come to them; we told the Lyceum Theater management to allow the Socialists to show moving pictures Sunday, and we will make no arrests because they were shown; as for such 'movies' on other Sundays—we probably shall hear from the church people, and we shall decide the matter when the time comes."

Director Charles S Hubbard, of the department of public safety thus explained why the police weren't arresting the Socialist leaders of Pittsburgh, who Sunday, at the Lyceum Theater, defied the police ban on Sunday motion pictures. Director Hubbard announced early last week that he had decided to cause information to be entered against those responsible for the display of the pictures if they were shown at the Lyceum Theater, and the Socialists seemed disappointed because he had changed his mind. Director Hubbard said that, personally, he thinks such pictures as have been shown in the course of the Sunday lectures at the Lyceum to be no bad things. In fact, he thinks they are good things for the working men who attend the lectures. "Certainly they could put their time to much worse use," he added. Mr. Hubbard acknowledged that religious and church organizations were responsible for the movement of the police against the Sunday picture show, but did not mention any names. The director repeated the statement which he made on several occasions recently, that there is no law or ordinance authorizing the suppression of Sunday motion pictures of an educational nature when there is no admission charged. He again said that the efforts to prevent the showing of the pictures were based on custom so ancient as to be almost law, which decreed that there should be no amusement enterprises in operation on Sunday.

The new motion picture house which is being built at Lincoln and Lemington avenues, East End, Pittsburgh, will be a one-story structure, 30 x120 feet, and will be built in conformity with the rules as laid down by the State Building Code Commission. TORONTO.

ALL records for a single week's business for a film in Toronto were broken by "Thirty Leagues Under the Sea," which closed its engagement at the Princess theater last Saturday. Three shows daily were given by the management and the theater, which seats 2,000, was crowded at every show. A feature, new to Toronto and tried on the suggestion of members of the Board of Education, was the special school children's matinee held every day at 4.30, which enabled children to go after school and yet arrive home before dark.

The Conness Till Film Company, with special permission from the Dominion government made some pictures last week of the members of the second Canadian contingent encamped at the Toronto Exhibition grounds. The 4,000 troops encamped there were put through some special maneouvers and the films are to be used to encourage enlistment by the Dominion government.

F. Leon Brick of the Garden theater, has decided to eliminate three matinees a week and will now show on Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday afternoons. He is also considering the advisability of changing his plan of campaign and showing nothing but the best multiple reel features at an admission of 25 cents. He is almost of the opinion that moving picture fans are ready to pay higher prices for the best pictures and are not attracted unless the prices are higher. This opinion seems to have been borne out by the experience of the large downtown theaters showing features at 25 and 50 cents.

Lacking the finesse of her elder sister, Fay determines to get on speaking terms with Steve. Learning that Jack is a doctor, she falls sick. Dorothy runs for the physician and thus friendship starts.

Matters failing to develop rapidly enough for Cupid, the little imp places a book on the Habits of Primitive Man, on Jack's table. The brothers find it. Helen, however, has fallen in love with Freddy, the son of the hotel proprietress. Later, Algy is declaring his love to Helen when Freddy enters. The boy seizes Algy and hangs him out of the window by his feet.

Millionbucks is courting Mrs. Fortune in the next room. The father peeks through the keyhole. Unable to see Freddy's face, Millionbucks believes it is Algy who is embracing Helen. Freddy discovers Millionbucks at the keyhole and places a mirror in front of the door. The reflection of his own eye tells the inquisitive father the lovers know he has been spying. Helen, the railroad telegrapher, saves Dick's life when the cowboy attempts to shoot him, by declaring the man unarmed. Giving Dick a revolver, Dan warns him to be prepared to shoot when next they meet.

A few minutes later, Dick's weapon is accidentally discharged. At the same instant Dan falls to the ground stunned. The cowpuncher's friends make a dash for the aeronaut, but, aided by Helen, Dick boards the outgoing Black Diamont Express and escapes.

Knowing the Black Diamond must make a wide detour before reaching the next station, the cattlemen ride across country to head off their quarry. Helen is aware of the fate which must be Dick's should he be captured. Dashing to the field where the man's assistant is tinkering with the aeroplane, she warns him of Dick's peril. Completing repairs, the man places Helen in the machine and sends it through the air in pursuit of the train.

The race between the cowboys and the aeroplane is won by the latter. Warned by Helen, Dick climbs into his flyer and eludes his pursuers. The latter follow in the wake of the machine. Just as the aeroplane reaches Eagle Bend it breaks down again and Dick is captured.

By this time, Dan has recovered. It develops that his wound was not caused by Dick's shot, but that he had stumbled against the hitching post and was thus stunned. Helen induces the cowboy to go to Dick's aid. Dick is saved from lynching in the nick of time. Later, both Dan and Dick propose to Helen, but the operator has still to meet the man she is to wed.

EDISON.

THE FLIRT (Dec. 14).—After primping most carefully, the Flirt started out for a day of conquest, thoroughly impressed with the power of his charms and convinced that no woman could withstand them. Meeting Grace, he proposed a walk through the autumn woods, and they no sooner reached a dell watered by a rustling brook when, suddenly, the Flirt caught sight of Gracie as she crossed the meadow on the way to tend her cows. His sudden decision to follow this new attraction caused Grace to lose her balance and fall into the brook. Her cries for help helped to attract him as he sped, intent upon the milkmaid's charms. Gracie was quite flattered at the Flirt's attentions, when again his watchful eye spied Grace More, and started off in her direction.

Here again his attention was only momentary, for Grace Full appeared on the scene, and on he scurried in her wake. Finding that she was desirous of learning how to swim, he volunteered his services, but just as she jumped into deep water he happened to catch sight of a smartly-clad figure in a roller chair and off he rushed to the bath house, leaving his charming pupil to the tender mercies of the waves, from which she was rescued by a gallant lifesaver. By this time the several Graces, reinforced by a policeman and the lifesaver, were hot upon the Flirt's trail, and they caught sight of him just after he discovered his latest charmer to be Dis Grace, a lady of pronounced color. Off he flew with the whole crowd at his heels. Finding all avenues of escape held by his pursuers, the Flirt ran out on a dock and thought to put them off of his trail by feigning suicide. A length of hose and a big stone served his purpose, as by blowing into the hose he caused most nautical bubbles to appear upon the surface of the water. He came out of his hiding place under the dock too soon, however, and was captured by the policeman, and placed in the roller chair, and trundled through the village to the merriment of the onlookers.

THE VANISHING OF OLIVE (Fourth of the Olive's Opportunities Series—Dec. 15).—Olive is at a reception at which Madame Forresti presents her protege, Olive Arden. She plays a difficult Roumanian air, and one of the guests makes an uncomplimentary remark about her, which she hears. Later, the guest congratulates Olive upon her playing. Olive refuses to shake her hand, whereat Madame Forresti is offended. Olive apologizes for her conduct, and determines to leave as she feels that she is only a savage, and can never be civilized and should return to her wild home. The monkey hears someone at the door and swings upon the knob. Olive opens the door quickly, and Boggs, the butler, falls on his face. She picks him up and beats him thoroughly, throwing him out of the room. He goes below stairs, meets his confederate, Drew Martin, and they plan to get rid of the girl who stands in the way of Drew's inheritance; because if Vance should marry Olive, he would lose the fortune. He engages a notorious Chinaman, keeper of an opium den, to dispose of the girl. She is abducted and taken into an opium joint, in the dungeon below, where victims of the opium are sleeping. She is stricken with terror at the creatures she encounters. The Chinaman's daughter, whom he loves dearly, is attracted to the monkey and takes it from Olive. It escapes from her down the fire-escape to the street. Vance finds the monkey, and with it as a clue, notifies the detective bureau.

The Chinaman, finding his place is surrounded by the police, comes below stairs to do away with Olive. In the meantime Yit Sing, sorry for Olive's loss, creeps into Olive's bunk to sympathize with her and puts her arms about Olive. The Chinaman steals up to Olive's bunk, and thrusts his dirk through the curtain. His little daughter's body falls at his feet. Olive leaps out of the bunk, up the stairs, and into the arms of her rescuers, while the Chinaman is looked after by the police.

ON CHRISTMAS EVE (Dec. 16).—Morris, the elder, trained in the old school of thrift and simple living, abominates the extravagance and pretensions of his daughter-in-law. While she is entertaining friends at an afternoon tea, Morris is with his two grandchildren in the library. The gaiety of his daughter-in-law's guests becomes boisterous, and the old man peeps between the portieres to find its cause. The curiousity of the children prompts them to do likewise. On seeing the guests depart, the youngsters enter the living room, and proceed to a furtive dispatch of the goodies. They are called to task by a quick-eyed maid, and ousted. Mrs. Morris, Jr., is stopped by her father-in-law, as she returns from bidding goodbye to her guests. He cautions her against further extravagant use of her money. She lets him understand that, if she and her husband begin to reduce expenses, he must not let it slip his mind that they are giving him a home gratis, and that his departure would be a good start. A conference on this subject between husband and wife leads to the old man being turned adrift.

A week before Christmas, the grandfather, who is quartered in a municipal lodging house, sees an advertisement calling for a Santa Claus for street corner charity work, makes application and is assigned as a Santa to keep a coin pot boiling for the Newsboys' Christmas dinner. While scanning a newspaper, he comes across an item, setting forth how his son has met with heavy financial losses, and that his business is ruined. While out marketing with the maid, Tommy Morris is attracted by the ringing of Santa Claus' Christmas bell and slips away from the maid to beg Santa to bring him a Christmas gift. The old grandfather recognizes his little grandson, and, with a promise to call, sends the child across the street to join his little sister and the maid. Tommy tells his sister of his meeting with Santa, and of Santa's promise, and on Christmas night, the old grandfather enters his son's home, and is heard by him. He learns that his son is able to settle one hundred cents to the dollar, and is shortly confronted by his daughter-in-law, whom the frown of Fortune has considerably subdued. With the old man reinstated in the Morris home, the children are brought in and learn Santa's identity. The peace and good will of Christmas now permeates the Morris home, and while father and mother set up and trim the Christmas tree, the children, nestling with their grandfather, watch them light heartedly.

THE COLONEL OF THE RED HUSSARS (A Dramatic Adaptation of the Novel by John Reed Scott—Three Parts—Dec. 18).—Major Dalberg was in the midst of a conversation with Courtney, detailing his meeting with Princess Dehra of Valaria, to whom he had introduced himself as Mr. Smith, also telling of the exploits of his ancestor, Hugo Dalberg, who, in 1777, left Valaria, against the King's will, to join Lafayette's forces in America, when suddenly he was called to the phone. Much to his surprise, it was the charming widow of his old friend, General Spencer, who pressed him to call before he left on his diplomatic mission to Valaria. Unable to refuse, he complied with her request, but was shocked at her peculiar behavior, which was especially untimely, as her husband's body was lying in state in the next room. Two weeks later, on his arrival at the court of Valaria, the King remarked upon the striking resemblance of the young major to the celebrated Hugo Dalberg, whose portrait hung in the throne room. On learning that the major was, in fact, a direct descendant of the celebrated soldier, he greeted him with enthusiasm. A few moments afterward, the Princess was announced, and was somewhat puzled at her father's very cordial reception of the major, whom she only knew as "Mr. Smith of Washington," according to the card he had given her at the time of their first meeting some time before.

Dalberg's charming manner, however, soon bridged this gap and their romance quickly blossomed, while his democratic ways so charmed the King that a grand-dukeship was conferred upon him, an act encouraged by the Princess. News of this event, coupling his name with that of Princess Dehra, reached Mrs. Spencer, and she immediately repaired to Paris. There, quite by accident, she met Arch Duke of Lotzen, heir presumptive to the throne, of Valaria. Recognizing Major Dalberg's portrait in a locket dropped by Mrs. Spencer, the Arch Duke followed up the acquaintance and finally secured her co-operation in a plan to undermine Dalberg's influence at the Court of Valaria. A bogus marriage certificate was secured, and, armed with this, it was arranged that she should go to Valaria and pose as Dalberg's wife. This plan was carried out, resulting in consternation at the court of Valaria. In spite of every effort to trip Mrs. Spencer into an admission that would clear his friend, Courtney failed, and so things remained until the night of the masked ball, when the Arch Duke of Lotzen picked a quarrel with Dalberg and an immediate duel was arranged for, which was interrupted by Princess Dehra's arrival on the scene.

A few moments later, King Frederick and Courtney came upon the Arch Duke and Mrs. Spencer in a summer house. The few words they overheard confirmed their suspicions of the pair, and when Mrs. Spencer supplemented this with an emphatic denial of all claims upon Dalberg, the entire matter was cleared up to the satisfaction of all concerned with the exception of the scheming couple whose machinations had all but ruined a beautiful romance.

THE BIRTH OF OUR SAVIOUR (Dec. 19).—In those days, there dwelt in Nazareth, a maiden, named Mary. She spent the days in meek duty, and of her men spoke only words befitting her great virtue, and, in her beauty, they saw but the mirror of her soul.

Oft fared she, with her urn, to the well, and upon a day, as she stooped to fill it, one, a wayfarer through the town, spoke lightly that she gazed to woo her loveliness imaged in the clear water, whereat his tongue clove to his mouth, and no word of whatsoever sort could he, thereafter, utter.

The many that sought her for wife gathered in the temple, each with staff in hand. And the Lord willed that the staff of him the most worthy of her would blossom, and lo! a flower blossomed on that of Joseph, and he espoused her.

To Mary was sent, Gabriel, the angel, saying that she would bring forth a Son, the Saviour. Before the fullness of her time, a bidding went forth from Augustus Caesar that all his people should be enrolled. And all went to be enrolled, every one into his own city. And Joseph also went up from Nazareth to Bethlehem. In Bethlehem, long sought they where they might tarry, and when the day was far spent, they made haste to the inn but there was no room. Downcast, Joseph led Mary, to the shelter of the chalk-hills, wherein was a cave for the housing of cattle. Mary brought forth her Son therein, and laid Him in the manger.

And while this marvel happened, three wise men, well mastered in the study of the stars, watched in lands far distant the studded sky. Lo! they behold a new star, such as men call a comet. The voice of the Lord spoke in them, and they, making purchases of gifts of gold, frankincense and myrrh, journeyed forthwith to Bethlehem. And, when they had come to Galilee whereof Herod was tetrarch, they asked boldly where He could be found, who is Christ, the King.

A great fear smote Herod, but with fair, treacherous words did he beg the wise men find this new King, long awaited by the nations, and bring him word, that he might, too, go and pay Him homage. But, when the wise men had found the Saviour and paid Him humble reverence, they went back, each to his own country, by a way other than they came.

And when Herod saw how he had been tricked, his evil mind fast plotted that the Saviour be slain, to which end he give word that no child within two years of age be spared. Upon his wish the Galilean mothers came with their tender babes and toddling children to glut their eyes upon the wonders hid in the gardens of Herod. With much delight did these mothers flock through the garden gateway, but cruelly were they thrust from out the far edge of the gardens, and left to moan the cruel taking off of their little ones.

Joseph, warned by an angel in the night, took Mary and the Infant, and made straight for the land of Egypt. Beneath a sycamore sought they rest. Naught was there to slake their thirst, but behold, an angel stood before them, and at his word, cool water bubbled from the ground. When the light of the morrow rose in the gray East, Joseph and Mary, with the Child fast in her arms, trudged to the strange, far-off land of Egypt.

THE GREATER LOVE (Dec. 14).—Shortly after the engagement of John Brown and Hope Avery is announced, he receievs an offer of a fine position in South America. She demurs at his going, but he overcomes her objections and after a tender farewell, leaves her with the promise to return within a year and make her his wife. Philip Lane is injured in an auto accident near the Avery home, and Hope discovers him. She has him taken to her home and during his convalescence, he falls deeply in love with her. When Lane proposes, she tells him of her absent fiance, and he decides to leave at once.

Meanwhile John prospers in South America. His roommate, whose name happens to be John Brown, is weak and sickly, and finally becomes threatened with consumption. John gets leave of absence, and, sending no word, he joyfully starts for home, to surprise Hope. Disguised as an old sailor, he approaches his sweetheart's home, only to find her saying farewell to Lane and hear him ask Hope, "If the man you are bound to were dead, could you love me?" She answers yes, and John staggers at the blow. Lane leaves the place. After a terrible mental struggle, he goes back to South America, and finding young John Brown dead, he sends notice and identification papers to the home newspapers. Later he receives a newspaper announcing Hope's marriage to Lane.

OUT OF THE PAST (Special—Two Parts—Dec. 15).—Rosa, Cyril Benton's Italian-American wife, is happy in the possession of a good husband, home and child. One night, during Benton's absence from home, Rosa is confronted by two midnight intruders, one of whom reveals himself as Giorgio, an old rejected lover of the girl, who threatens, in the event of her failure to turn over the contents of her husband's safe, to tell Benton how, years ago, his now bright and contented wife had killed her first husband; and so tarnish her name that even the legitimacy of her five-year-old child will be questioned. The cornered woman explains passionately that her crime was perpetrated in self-defence, that he, Giorgio, knows it, having been an eye-witness. She begs him to spare her life, telling how she found a good home and sympathetic friends in Benton and his mother. The latter died and Benton ultimately married her. Rosa ends up her recital by frantically imploring Giorgio to go. The other intruder steps out at this point. He is Luigi, her father, whom she had thought killed in a brawl years ago, but who had, instead, recovered from the effects of the fight and joined Giorgio as a partner in crime. The old man's latent parental instincts are brought out, and he favors leaving the girl in peace. Giorgio, however, refuses to be deprived of his prey and tries to force the safe combination from Rosa. Her father, rushing to her assistance, engages in a stiletto duel with the rascal. Giorgio is killed, and at this juncture Benton returns unexpectedly. He rushes in and Rosa cries, "I managed to kill one, but the other overpowered me!" Luigi, without a word, accepts the situation and surrenders as a common burglar for his daughter's sake. Luigi dies later in the hospital from wounds received in the duel.

THE EGYPTIAN MUMMY (Dec. 16).—Simply because he is poor, Dick is not wanted as a prospective son-in-law by Professor Hicks, a scientist seeking the recipe for the elixir of life. He finally discovers the combination of chemicals, and wild with delight, advertises for a mummy to try it on. Dick sees the ad., and he gets Tim, a tramp, to agree to pose as the mummy, and with the aid of the landlady's son, the hobo is soon swathed in bandage-like wrappings, painted and decorated so that he resembles a mummy. A coffin is procured, then Dick sends word to Professor Hicks that he has a mummy for sale at $5,000. The latter delightedly buys it on the spot. Dick at once invests in stock at the suggestions of a friend, tells Eva, the Professor's daughter, and awaits results. Hicks fills up a big syringe with the elixir of life and jabs it into Tim. The tramp-mummy certainly comes to life, and unmistakably proves it by chasing Professor Hicks round and round the room. Finally, the latter, after many bruises, escapes out the door, slams and locks it. His daughter and the rest of the household come to his assistance and he tremblingly tells them his elixir worked altogether too well. Next morning, after finishing up the drinkables and smokeables, Tim escapes by way of the fire-escape, first shutting down the coffin lid. Hicks, lame and sore, cautiously creeps to the door and hearing no noise, concludes the mummy has returned to the coffin. He enters, sees the lid is closed and quickly nails it down. In the meantime, Dick hears that his stock has gone up 20 points and that he is now rich. He meets Tim, gives him his old clothes and some money, then goes to the Professor, claims his bride and secures Hick's consent.

Madge, comes into a fortune, Colonel Ponsonby strongly favors the timid young man's suit. Madge absolutely refuses to marry Hugh and the Colonel locks her in her room. Madge is a strong-willed spirited girl, and dons a man's suit she wore at a masquerade. Then, tying the bed sheets into a kind of rope, she lets herself out the window and starts for the home of her school chum, Jessie Strickland. Jessie is astounded when she learns the handsome young stranger is her old friend Madge. It is decided to introduce Madge as a cousin of Jessie's. This works finely, except that Mrs. Harley's suspicions are aroused by the intimacy evidenced between Jessie and her "gentlemanly cousin." Harry becomes jealous of the newcomer. The Colonel and Witherly meanwhile arrive at the house, but do not recognize Madge in her disguise. The Colonel is invited to spend the night. Later, Mrs. Harley overhears a plan between Madge and Jessie to meet and discuss important matters when the rest have retired and fears the worst. All sorts of amusing and thrilling complications occur, until, finally, to avoid serious trouble, Madge has to declare her real identity. She certainly creates a sensation and Witherly is horrified at the thought of his future wife wearing trousers. He gives up his plan to marry her and flees in despair. Tom, Jessie's brother, however, finds he has fallen in love with the sprightly Madge. Jessie and her sweetheart, Harry, declare their intentions and everybody is happy when the Colonel sees a probability of getting his troublesome niece off his hands in the very near future.

WHO'S WHO IN HOGG'S HOLLOW (Dec. 18). The little town of Hogg's Hollow is startled by Bixford, with his family and friends speeding through it in a big automobile. On the way they meet Phineas Hogg, driving his horse-drawn bus, and he orders them to stop. They pay no attention. A little further on the car breaks down, and Hogg chuckles to himself. The Bixford family soon find out who's who in Hogg's Hollow. Showing his sheriff's badge, Hogg "pinches" them for speeding, tows them back to jail, and then seating himself in the Judge's seat, fines them for speeding, hauling automobile and bus fares. They are then told they can put up at the Palace Hotel, while the car is being repaired. To their astonishment, Hogg is proprietor and charges them exorbitant prices for everything. That night, Bixford and his family, shivering with cold, ring for a bell-boy. Hogg puts on bell-hop's suit and answers it. They ask for extra blankets, but Hogg tells them they will have to wait till the horse gets back. While hunting next day, Bixford finds to his dismay that he has been poaching and that Hogg is the gamewarden! Fifty dollars fine has to be paid. The ladies of the party go shopping and discover that Hogg is postmaster, department store owner and salesman. Meanwhile, Flora Bixford and George, Hogg's son, just from college, fall in love. When Bixford's request by mail for funds arrive, Hogg, acting as bank cashier, cashes it for him, then holds court, and announces that after all bills and fines are paid, Bixford has a "dollar and sixty cents coming." An appeal to the Governor only results in Bixford being referred to Mr. Hogg, and the whole party feel pretty blue. The climax comes when George and Flora announce their intention of getting married. Bixford almost faints, then angrily says no, but George threatens to tell his father and Bixford wilts. Hogg, as usual, is in on the ceremony, he being the minister.

MR. SANTA CLAUS (Special—Two Parts—Dec. 19).—Celeste Moissant, the young widow of a victim of the European war, moves into the boarding house where Bobby Walton lives on the floor above. On Christmas Eve, Celeste undresses Fanchon, her little daughter, tells her tales of Santa Claus, and together they hang up the child's stocking, then write out her choice of Christmas presents on slips of paper and send them up the chimney. Celeste puts the child to bed and leaves her to dream of Santa Claus and toys, while she hurries to the Pink Rat Cafe, where she sings. Bobby receives a letter containing the pleasant news that he has been left a fortune, and enclosing a substantial check in advance. Returning from cashing it, he meets Fanchon in the hall, and the child asks him if he is Santa Claus. Bobby carries her back to bed, and touched by her innocent prattle, goes out again and buys her all the toys he can carry. Passing the Pink Rat Cafe, he meets two friends who drag him in, toys and all. It proves fortunate for Celeste, for Bobby later saves her from the undesirable attentions of an intoxicated habitue of the place. Sick of the unhealthy atmosphere of the place, Bobby departs soon after this incident. Celeste is blamed for the disturbance, and discharged. Returning home tired and discouraged, with the little doll she had bought with her last dollar, Celeste finds Bobby in her room busily decorating an artificial palm on lieu of a Christmas tree, for Fanchon's benefit. He explains his presence there and wins a promise from her that she and the child will take Christmas dinner with him.

THE BELOVED ADVENTURER SERIES NO. 14 A PERILOUS PASSAGE (Dec. 14). Lord and Lady Cecil (Betty) have returned to Croftlaigh, and the sorrows and dangers of the past are forgotten in peace and happiness. As a surprise for Betty, Cecil has brought from Nevada the cow-pony Betty had used and loved. Suddenly their serenity is disturbed by the appearance of Captain Robert Stanley, Cecil's nephew, who faces ruin and disgrace, and who appeals for aid and advice. Robert, after a brilliant military exploit in Northern India, was entrusted by the king of the newly-subdued state of Gokaral with a priceless jewel known as the "Star of Gokaral," to be delivered to the King of Great Britain. This jewel is regarded by the people of Gokaral as sacred, and they give their allegiance blindly to whosoever possesses it. Its political value is therefore enormous. The jewel has been stolen from Robert, after he reached England, by the secret agents of a foreign government. The identity of these agents is unknown to Robert. As a matter of fact, the head of the gang is the Countess Lurovich, an adventuress, who has on previous occasions come near bringing disaster upon both Robert and Lord Cecil. The Countess' country place adjoins Cecil's estate of Croftlaigh.

Betty chances to discover that the "Star of Gokaral" is in the possession of the Countess' gang, and is about to be taken from England. There is no time to summon aid, and Betty bravely undertakes to recover the jewel, alone. She does so by the aid of the cow-pony, Pinto, and her lasso. She is at once attacked by the Countess and her band, and her life is saved only by the opportune arrival of Croftlaigh peasants who rally to the aid of their young mistress. The Countess and her pack suffer spectacular death through the collapse of the cliff which has been undermined by the sea. Betty restores to Robert the "Star of Gokaral."

WEARY WILLIE'S RAGS (Dec. 15).—Henry Paff, a well-to-do business man in a small town, is obliged to make a trip to the city. He arrives late, puts up at a hotel and sleeps very soundly. So does the hotel clerk; for, during the night, William Ragson, a tramp, sneaks into Paff's room and exchanges his old rags for Paff's neat attire. In the morning Paff discovers his loss and tries to telephone the office without success, and is finally obliged to put on the tramp's filthy rags which change his appearance so greatly that when he complains to the clerk he gets no satisfaction and is kicked out by the porter who carried in his luggage.

In the meantime, Ragson, dressed in Paff's clothes and in possession of all his money and papers, lives on the fat of the land, and when he meets Paff on the street he kicks him out of the way. Poor Paff, unable to identify himself, or get any redress, gets desperately hungry and appropriates a lunch-basket he finds on a bench in the park. He is promptly arrested and when taken to the station is surprised to meet Ragson who has been arrested for riotous behavior. The hotel keeper is summoned; Paff is identified and Ragson meets the fate of all transgressors.

IT CURED HUBBY (Dec. 15).—Norma, the pretty president of "The Temperance Union," enlists the aid of the minister in an effort to cure her hubby, Ferdie, of being a "good fellow." They plan to simulate the appearance of slight intoxication when Ferdie returns from one of his usual good times, relying upon the shock to have the desired moral effect. Ferdie phones his usual excuse for absence and the scheme is put in operation. They procure two bottles labeled "whiskey" and fill them with sarsaparilla. The bottles are left in the kitchen and the conspirators await hubby's return.

Meanwhile, the cook and her blue-coated friend have a love affair, and during the struggle for a kiss the bottles are knocked out the window and smashed on the pavement below. Thinking to shield the cook, the cop replaces the imitation with real whiskey and when Ferdie is heard laboring up the front steps, Norma gets the supposed soft stuff which she and the minister begin drinking in large gulps as Ferdie enters.

He almost drops lifeless when his demure wife and the sedate minister bolt about the room doing the tango, and to make matters worse, the members of the Temperance Union drop in when the revel is at its height. Norma revives sufficiently to seek an explanation. She drags in the cook and matters are soon explained. The shocked members of the union are reconciled, and Ferdie loses no time in signing the pledge.

THE BOMB (Special—Two Parts—Dec. 16). When Count Ivan, a Russian nobleman, falls under the displeasure of the government, Duke Boris is commanded by the Czar to deliver to the Count, a notice of the confiscation of his property and his banishment from Russia. The old Count is stunned by the blow. While he reads the Imperial order, Sonia, the Count's daughter, appears, and Boris is surprised to recognize in her a woman whom he has previously seen and admired. Sonia flames in anger at Boris, ordering him from the house. When she rushes to her father's side, she finds him dead, killed by the shock of his misfortune. She rises from her knees and swears to be revenged against the government, and Boris, as its agent.

Fearing arrest herself, she secures her jewels and a bomb which her father had invented, and which was the cause of the imperial displeasure, and hides in the poorer parts of the city.

Boris, seeking Sonia, finds that she has joined a society of anarchists and joins the society himself, in an effort to win her and rescue her from her dangerous associations. He rescues her from insult at the hands of Michael, one of the members, thus winning Sonia's love and Michael's enmity. Michael plots against Boris, or "Kamoroff," as he is known in his disguise. When Boris tries to persuade Sonia to give up the leadership of the society, which she has assumed, she accuses him of faint-heartedness in the cause, and sends him from her, and Boris, fearing to remain longer absent from court, sends word for his apartments to be made ready. The message falls into the hands of Peter, one of the anarchists, and unknown to Boris, they plan to place the bomb, invented by Count Ivan, in his rooms. Sonia is chosen to place the bomb.

After Sonia has departed on her dangerous mission, Michael rushes in, crying that he has discovered "Kamoroff" to be the Duke Boris, whom they have sworn to kill. The anarchists all start in pursuit. In the meanwhile, Boris has discovered the loss of papers telling his identity and, in the midst of the realization of his danger, he hears the anarchists coming. He escapes by the window with Michael and the others in close pursuit. In the meanwhile, Sonia has reached Boris' apartments and has placed the bomb, stretching the trip-string across the floor. Boris succeeds in reaching his room. In the darkened apartment, Sonia conceals herself and when Boris enters, she springs upon him with a dagger. The anarchists start to batter down the door. Sonia and Boris, struggling, recognize each other in the moonlight. They draw apart in surprise and horror. Boris' foot strikes the string from the bomb and trips the mechanism. The door is yielding to the attack of the anarchists. Sonia, forgetting her revenge, throws herself into Boris' arms. She sees the smoking bomb and starts back in alarm at this new danger. At that moment the anarchists rush into the outer room. Sonia faints, and Boris, seizing the smoking bomb, hurls it at the on-coming "brotherhood." With a flash of flame and smoke it explodes. In the wrecked room, Boris recovers consciousness. The anarchists are piled in the doorway, killed by their bomb. In Boris' arms, Sonia opens her eyes, her thirst for revenge swallowed up in her great love

WHEN THE BLIND SEE (Special—Two Parts —Dec. 17).—Of the two sons of John Green, a retired farmer, the elder, Joe, is the practical business man. He runs the farm and makes it pay. The father is satisfied to leave everything in his hands because the younger son, Edwin, is a quiet, easy-going chap, who cares a great deal more for study than for money-making Ruth, the sister, is partial to the younger. She mothers him and protects him from the hard ways of Joe. Believing that he is the only member of the family fit to have possession of the farm, Joe decides to make his title to it secure. The father signs a deed to the place, giving everything over to Joe, without examining the paper.

After John Green's death Joe astounds his brother and sister by declaring his ownership of the homestead and showing the deed. He tells Edwin that there is no place for him and advises him to get out at once and shift for himself. Ruth protests and when Joe shows firmness elects to go with her younger brother who, she thinks, needs her care. The two go to the city where Edwin realizes his life-long ambition to attend medical college. Ruth never lets him know that in order to keep him in college she is obliged to work and earn money during his absence, and it never occurs to Edwin to question that the little sum they took with them when they left home would last so long as it seems to.

Meanwhile Joe discovers oil on the farm and his wells make him wealthy. His enjoyment of his riches is not wholly unalloyed, however, for he finds his eyesight failing. Sudden attacks of blindness which are only temporary, worry him and cause him to consult a specialist. Meanwhile, Edwin graduates from medical college as a surgeon and perfects a difficult new operation on the eyeball. The disease for which he has found a cure is the one his brother has. Neither of the brothers has kept track of the other. When Joe's specialist tells him of the young surgeon whose wonderful skill has set surgical circles agog, Joe comments on the coincident that the names are the same, but does not suspect that it is his brother. He determines to see the surgeon and goes to his office where the recognition takes place. Edwin at first refuses to perform the operation, but in the end the kind-hearted counsel of the sister induces him to relent. The operation successfully performed, Joe makes atonement for the past.

THE COMEDIENNE'S STRATEGY (Dec. 18).—Mlle. Rosie is a fascinating music-hall artiste who has captivated the impressionable old Major Kirkham. The Major dances attendance upon her at all times, and makes her life a burden by his constant proposals of marriage. Hazel, the Major's daughter, is in love with Fred Mayer and gazes longingly at his picture when he is absent. Fred has kept out of the Major's way, fearing his irascible temper, and at length persuades the shrinking Hazel to elope with him.

In the meantime, the Major has again appeared before Rosie with his inevitable proposal of marriage, and in desperation to get rid of him, tells him that she is married and shows him a photograph which she declares is that of her husband. The Major returns to his office, where he finds a letter from Hazel telling him of her marriage and enclosing her husband's picture. When the Major sees it, he nearly faints. It is the photograph of Rosie's husband.

He swears out a warrant for Fred's arrest, and starts in pursuit, accompanied by a squad of police. When he overtakes the auto with Hazel and Fred, the young bridegroom is turned over to the police as a bigamist, and the fainting girl is loaded into her father's car. It seems all up with the happiness of Fred and Hazel until Rosie appears at the police station and explains the joke. Hazel goes away with Rosie's "husband" and the newlyweds are made happy. The Major is cured of a bad temper and his desire to marry the singer.

WHO'S WHO (Dec. 19).—Jim Inko stops to tell Dr. Black that his (Jim's) wife is a little off in the top piece. The doctor promises to do what he can for her. The daily papers give an account of a negro with unbalanced mind roaming about. In making his visit, the doctor gets into the wrong house and the occupant, having read an account of the crazy negro, thinks the doctor is the crazy man. On entering the room the doctor finds the woman he thinks in a terrible frame of mind and tries to humor her. There are a number of shots fired. The noise brings the neighbors and police, and the doctor is told of his mistake.

SHALL CURFEW RING TO-NIGHT (Dec. 19).—Bess, a lady barber, is beloved by Willie Gumph, also by General Bovril, a despotic officer. The General discovers Willie making love to Bess in the barber shop, and orders him killed that evening at the ringing of the curfew. Bess calls upon the old sexton and tries to bribe him with a stogie. The sexton lights the stogie, listens to her story and then starts for the church. The valiant Bess makes an attempt to bribe him with a half-dozen bottles of beer. The sexton drinks the beer and continues on his way. Bess secures a basket-full of bombs which she hurls at the old man without effect; so she makes a rush for the church, steals a ladder, climbs into the belfry, detaches the bell from the beam and ties the bell rope around her waist. The old sexton arrives and pulls the bell rope, as usual, with Bess acting as a counter-weight.

All of this time, poor Willie is tied to a cannon with a keg of powder and a fuse in front of him. General Bovril, failing to hear the curfew ring, leaves the fort and goes to the old church to ascertain the cause. When his head appears through the trap in the belfry, Bess promptly kicks him in the face, and he falls to the ground below. Bess hastens to the spot of execution with a forged letter to the commanding officer, which orders the release of Willie Gumph. She stamps out the fuse, cuts Willie loose, and the soldiers join in the general rejoicing.

He flirts with a pretty girl and is trounced by Miranda, takes a trolley ride and returns by auto only to find out that he has a taxicab bill to pay. The girls crowd around Josh on the beach. Seeing Miranda coming he flees abandoning her duster and bag.

Eph and Sinda, a pair of colored newly-weds, find the duster and Sinda puts it on. Looking for lost articles, Josh mistakes Sinda for his wife and follows her and Eph to their home. As Eph and his friends play cards, Josh crawls in through Sinda's window. Then he discovers his mistake for Eph, Sinda and the rest pursue him.

Miranda joins in the chase. Josh and Miranda crawl into a little house which is blown up by a United States Army explosion test, using aeroplane to drop bombs. The explosion lands Miranda in the river. She is rescued by two policemen who take her to the police station. As Miranda is arguing with the sergeant Josh arrives through the roof. He and Miranda, reunited, embrace.

INDEPENDENT FILM STORIES

UNIVERSAL

A CORRECTION.

On page 1278 of Nov. 28 issue there was published a synopsis of a KayBee picture entitled "The Hateful God." It was stated that that picture would be released on November 20. That is an error, for the subject was released on November 13.

POWERS.

THE SCENARIO EDITOR'S DREAM (Nov. 20).—The temperamental moving picture director is at his wit's end. He must have a scenario dealing with the war situation. While in a frenzy he is interrupted by Hippocrates MacGuinness, who blithely hands him a few bushels of scenarios with such sensational themes as "Gathering the Myrtle with Mary" and "La Petite Avoirdupois," or "Truck Horse Soubrette." The director's first impulse is to hurl the palpitating Hippocrates from the highest battlements, but he restrains his ardor and pleasantly jostles him down the staircase.

Acting upon this helpful though gentle hint, the pleasant-mannered poet tries to write a war story. He goes into a sweet slumber. His pensive brain becomes delirious and he sees forts fall, castles crumble, Zeppelins more plentiful than pigeons, while the blowing up of a man-of-war and the crumbling of trains into smoke are subjects scarce worth the recording. He thinks of a man of dire destiny who invents a portable machine that thinks no more of the enemy's fleet than a matinee girl would of one pound of chocolates. The sky is aflame with burning aeroplanes. Midnight becomes as bright as day as the air monsters explode and fall to the ground a mass of molten steel, while the oceans bubble like cauldrons and the sky shines like a burnished mirror.

Then he awakens as the studio scenery falls on him. He is too excited by the nightmare to heed this, and feverishly writes the story.

REX.

AMBITION (Two Parts—Dec. 7).—John Willis, an artist, and Belle Le Veer, a cheery little vaudeville artist, are friends, just friends. For that reason when John meets Marion Davis, an ambitious young actress down on her luck, he feels free to propose to her. Belle is heartbroken but conceals her grief.

Five years pass. The child falls ill at a time little son, Don. The child falls ill at a time when John's pictures are not selling well and Marion, having an offer to return to the stage under the management of Hemenway, a famous producer, accepts the offer and leaves the child in John's care.

Marion makes a hit in the part which has been created for her. After the performance she goes to dinner with her company, leaving John alone. Soon afterward John and Marion quarrel and John, feeling for the child, surrenders little Don to Marion. The child is given into the care of hired nurses who neglect him. Marion, more interested in her footlight success than in the care of her child, leaves home one night when the child falls desperately ill.

Fearful of disappointing her audience, Marion sends for John to take care of the boy. Despite the father's and doctor's work, the boy dies in the night. Enraged that his wife should leave her dying child in order to strut before a theater audience, John goes to the theater, denounces Marion and strips her of her baubles and tinsel. Then, dazed by his child's death and Marion's desertion, he seeks out his old friend Belle.

Belle, good-hearted little soul that she is, ministers to the half-crazed husband, carefully concealing her real feeling for him. Marion, depressed and repentant at her husband's denunciation which she feels is well deserved, gives up the stage and lives alone, seeking to find her husband.

Away from the world in a quiet cottage John starts a picture for exhibition at the autumn salon. A vision comes to him of his wife and child as they used to look years before in his old studio. Using this vision as the subject of his picture, John wins first prize at the salon with his masterpiece. Marion hears of the painting and goes to see it. As she turns away with tears in her eyes faithful little Belle brings John to her. There is a reconciliation and, while husband and wife stand together before the picture of their child, the little vaudeville artists slips unnoticed from the gallery, happy to have brought them together again.

A PAGE FROM LIFE (Two Parts—Dec. 21).—Thomas Carter, a crippled artist, has difficulty selling his sketches and ornate pen drawings. With a daughter to support the artist is in desperate straits when he meets Charlie Breen, the leader of a band of clever crooks who live by their wits. Breen, recognizing Carter's skill with the pen, ingratiates himself into the artist's good graces and then points out to him how easy it would be to forge signatures to checks so even the owner of the signature would be deceived.

Carter finally falls in with Breen's plans and with clever Wall street crooks to assist in the passing of the forged paper, quickly attains affluence. The members of the band make it a point to attend public gatherings and balls where they scrape acquaintance with rich "prospects." At one of these balls which Carter and his daughter attend, Rita Carter, who knows nothing of her father's connection with Breen's band, meets Richard Maybrick, a wealthy young man of excelent family.

Secretly Breen has determined to possess himself of Rita and Maybrick's attentions to her causes Breen to vent his spite on Carter. When Carter permits Maybrick to call upon his daughter, Breen, thinking the penman is about to give up his connection with the band, calls upon him and a stormy interview ensues.

Rita overhears the recriminations and learns for the first time of her father's connection with the band. The news depresses her immeasurably and when Maybrick again calls, feeling herself unworthy of him, she breaks with him, tearfully returning his ring. Breen, from concealment, witnesses the parting and, mad with mingled rage and jealousy, returns to his associates in crime. A quarrel between Breen and one of the band causes the crook to "peach" upon his pals to the police.

Carter is heartbroken when he learns his daughter has broken off with Maybrick because of his connection with the forgers. His grief changes to rage when he recalls the part Breen has played in ruining his daughter's prospects. Carter determines to "get" Breen and leaves home with a loaded revolver.

Maybrick, sensing something mysterious in Rita's abrupt termination of their engagement, returns to the Carter home in time to see Carter leave, weapon in hand. He follows him to the quarters of the gang and witnesses a raid by the police, who have been tipped off by one of the disgruntled crooks. In this raid Carter is wounded but makes his escape and Maybrick, coming upon him while he is weak from loss of blood, takes him to his home.

Breen meanwhile has gone to Carter's home, determined to have his will with Rita. Rita learns of his coming and telephones Maybrick, who hurries to her assistance. Maybrick comes upon Breen in the Carter home and a desperate fight follows, in which the young man shoots and kills Rita's assailant. When Maybrick and Rita return to the Maybrick home they find Carter is sinking fast and cannot live long. The dying artist gives the young couple his blessing and wishes them happiness in their new life together.

ECLAIR.

THE GIRL AND THE STAGE DRIVER (Two Parts—Dec. 2).—The old stage driver and his pretty daughter live happily in a prosperous mining town. The girl is devoted to her fine old father, who has been the stage driver for several years. Needless to say, the girl is a splendid horsewoman and has learned to drive the stage. Her lover is the sheriff, and is an intimate friend of her father. On one of his trips, the stage driver is entrusted with $5,000 in gold, which he is to deliver to the postoffice in the next town. Two wily Mexicans overhear the conversation between the stage driver and the sheriff concerning the money. They decide to hold up the stage that night.

Ruth kisses her old father good-bye, little dreaming that it is for the last time. The stage is held up by the two Mexicans. The old man fights for his life and his charge. The villains do not hesitate to shoot the old man, and after pocketing the gold depart, leaving the body of the stage driver in the road under the stage. At the village it is discovered that the stage is overdue and a party is sent out. They find the body, and hastily send out a posse to catch the murderers. When the daughter is informed of the tragic death of her parent she is overcome, and her lover promises to avenge his death.

In the meantime the Mexicans are hiding in the mountains with the booty. They each try to steal the gold and cheat the other, ending in a bitter quarrel.

After a few days of mourning, Ruth decides to take her father's place. The next pay-day comes, and once more gold is sent to the next town via the stage. The brave girl fears nothing. But once again the pair attempt their nefarious work and the girl is tied to the stage by the wrists. All seems hopeless, but the sheriff, fearing that some evil may befall the girl, follows, and he finds her in this awful plight. He quickly cuts her bonds, and together they muster a crowd of miners in the village who determine to wipe out the hold-up men.

Then commences a series of fights and captures. The Mexicans hide in the underbrush, and are about to make their escape when they are caught, and then justice is done. They meet their deserved fate.

A GAME OF WITS (Two Parts—Dec. 16).—George Howard, the handsome but weak-willed secretary to the American envoy, who has assisted in the formulation of the treaty, decides to secure a copy of the treaty, and, by selling it to the secret service of another power, to make a small fortune.

In order to make a copy of the document Howard takes the treaty from the Government archives. Its theft is immediately discovered and Howard flees. Donna Inez, an adventuress and spy in the employ of a Central American power, learns of the theft of the treaty and of Howard's disappearance. She learns of the hiding place of the traitorous secretary and scrapes acquaintance with him.

Learning where he has hidden the document she disguises herself as a scrub woman, but is surprised while attempting to make off with the treaty. Her tears prevent Howard from dealing roughly with her and later by means of the wiles of a woman of the world she makes Howard believe she is infatuated with him.

Meanwhile Steele, a Government secret service man, has been assigned to follow Howard. He learns of the affair between the former trusted secretary and Donna Inez. The clever adventuress finds that she and Howard are being shadowed and flees to Arizona, leaving a note with Howard telling him she will meet him in Tucson on a certain date. Howard, willing to sell his honor for a kiss, wires her he will join her with the treaty.

Donna Inez, disguises herself as a gypsy and joins her lover, Pedro, on a wagon train passing through the Arizona mining town. Steele intercepts Howard's telegram and follows him to Tucson, where he makes his identity known at a critical moment and saves the young American from disgrace. Howard, laughed at by Donna Inez and her lover, Pedro, determines to return to the North to stand trial for his crime. Howard's assurance that no one beside himself had learned the contents of the treaty seemed to indicate that Uncle Sam would not mete out the full punishment of the law to the former secretary.

GOLD SEAL.

THE GHOST OF SMILING JIM (Two Parts—Dec. 15).—Jim and Harry, two young miners, descuss in a public place a strike they have made and are overheard by Higby, a scheming ne'er-do-well. Higby, learning that the young miners have not filed a claim to their lucky strike, determines to "jump" them. This he does and establishes himself with friends on the claim before Harry and Jim return.

The young miners attempt to oust the interlopers but are worsted in a gun fight. Harry is killed and Jim falls over a cliff. He is given up for dead. He recovers from the accident, but remembers nothing of his previous life. Making his way into the mountains he lives the life of a hermit, eating wild game he has killed by stealth and fish he nets in the mountain stream.

Meantime his wife, having received a letter from Jim, written by the now demented miner before Higby jumped his claim, comes west with her little daughter. She learns that her husband's claim has been stolen and he had fallen over a cliff in a fight with the claim jumpers.

For a time Jim's wife and daughter live in one of the houses which Higby has built from the profits of his stolen mine. Struggle as she does to keep a roof over her own and her daughter's head, Jim's wife finally finds herself unable to pay the rent and is ejected by Higby. Soon after the mother dies from shock and exposure and her daughter is taken into the Higby home, where she is made a household drudge.

The girl has dreams of her own and often hears the neighbors telling of a ghost which roams the mountains and appears on the outskirts of the mining village only at nightfall. For months she dreams of visiting this lonesome soul and seizes the first opportunity to steal away into the hills to search out the supposed apparition.

Night comes on and while she rides over the hills she sees a bowed figure scuttling along before her. Riding up fearlessly to the supposed ghost, the girl dismounts and puts her arms tenderly about him. She finds that the "ghost" is a middle-aged man with a face lined from suffering and his struggles to eke out a living from the woods and streams.

Interested in the story which this creature tries to tell, the girl lingers in the mountains until a storm overtakes her. A tree, uprooted by the fierce gale, crushes in the cabin roof and the recluse is pinned beneath it. In its fall the tree strikes the hermit a glancing blow on the

There is a happy reconciliation and Jim spends the rest of the evening telling his daughter of the wrong that had been done him fifteen years before. Together father and daughter evolve a clever plan to bring Highby to justice. The plan succeeds and the close of this story finds Jim and his daughter happily established in a beautiful home, built with money recovered after Higby's imprisonment.

CHRISTMAS SPIRIT (Two Parts—Dec. 19).—Old Harry, the derelict, climbs out of a box car and is kicked and beaten off by a trainman. He tramps the railroad to a town and going to a kitchen door, begs for food. A Christmas Eve party is on and he is taken in, given clothes and made up as Santa Claus. After the party, and the children go to bed, old Harry breaks down and tells his story to Mary and John, brother and sister, each married with children.

The derelict's story: "Harry, a sailor, has a wife and two children in a nice cottage in a seaport town. It is a happy family. He goes away on a voyage and is wrecked at sea. His wife reads of the wreck and that all on board have been drowned. Harry is washed up on a deserted beach in a strange country. Months later he makes his way home, only to find the house deserted, so he continues his wanderings for years in search of his loved ones. He tells his hearers the last he saw of his wife and children was their sailing a little boat he had carved. John and Mary looked at a small dismantled bark above the fireplace, and, showing it and an old photo in the family album to him, they recognize old Harry as their long-lost father. The grandchildren come down in their night clothes, and the picture fades with the kiddies climbing all over their grandpap's knees."

THE HEART OF THE HILLS (Three Parts—Dec. 17).—'Lisbeth Ann is a child of the wilds. In a gingham gown and barefeet she roams the mountain sides as care-free as the birds which carol in the pine trees above her. Creeping along the mountain trail one morning she overhears two men discussing a land deal in which her father has been concerned. To her dismay she learns that her father has disposed of a valuable piece of land underneath which are rich coal veins.

Realizing that her father has been duped, the girl is about to shoot the man who has bought the property, when his kindly face restrains her. She tells her father of the imposition, and her parent calls the hill men together. He warns a young surveyor who has conducted the negotiations that he intends to recover his former property. The young surveyor, who also is the son of the purchaser of the property, defies the mountaineer and a pitched battle results in which the young man is wounded.

Pity for the handsome young man overtakes 'Lisbeth, and gathering him into her arms she takes the young surveyor to her home, where, much against her father's wishes, she nurses him back to health. Young Matthews, the surveyor, falls in love with his rosy-cheeked nurse during the long weeks of his convalescence and his fiancee, a wealthy heiress from the city, soon discovers his infatuation during a visit to 'Lisbeth's cabin.

When her attempts to regain young Matthews' regard prove futile, the heiress plans to bring about 'Lisbeth's ruin. Accordingly, she invites the untutored child to the city, promising to educate her and make her "worthy of the m she is to marry."

She introduces the child to some of her male friends of doubtful reputation and encourages them in making mad love to the little mountain girl. Shamed by the child's all too apparent innocence, they make a pet of her. On every hand 'Lisbeth's naive ways and charming disposition open to her the doors of the most exclusive homes in the great city and the heiress' plans to corrupt the child fail miserably. In the end the daughter of the hills marries the sweetheart she has nursed back to health and her father, incidentally, is given a part ownership in the coal mines which are sunk on his old property.

THE COWARD (Two Parts—Nov. 30).—David Harris, a well-to-do young merchant, marries the daughter of a wealthy colonel. Ignorant of the fact that his bride's mother had been a drunkard, Harris holds a colossal banquet in honor of the marriage. During the feast much wine is served. This is the first time that the bride tastes spirits of any kind. Her mother's failing comes to the surface; a terrible craving takes root. Marks, a man of rather dubious antecedents, who secretly loves her, notices this, and plots her downfall. He takes pains to see that the wife has all the drink she desires. Harris discovers his wife's tragic craving, and resolves to put up a struggle to save her. The colonel confesses the truth, regarding the bride's mother, to Harris.

Meanwhile war is declared. Harris undergoes a terrible mental combat, his love for his wife fighting against his duty to his country. He finally decides to stay out of the army that he might stay with his wife, who is being continually supplied with liquor from Marks. Marks feigns a broken arm. In this manner he saves himself from going to war. Harris's friends depart for the front, believing him to be a coward.

A year passes. A baby is born to Harris and his wife. The wife has tried in vain to overthrow the craving thirst, while Marks has been secretly supplying her with liquor. One night the wife dreams that she sees her baby grown to manhood, lying drunk in a gutter. In the next room Harris lies asleep. In his dreams he reviews what might have been. He sees himself with his comrades on the battlefield where all is glory. The wife awakens and, terrified, she calls him. He hurries to her, and finds her huddled in a heap on the floor. she swears she will never, never drink again.

Harris does not believe that he can believe this promise, so he decides to test his wife. A few nights later he leaves a bottle in her room and peers in through the keyhole. The wife enters and sees the spirits. A battle rages within. It finally seems that she can hold out no longer; she approaches the bottle. Suddenly, in the bottle she seems to see her little baby. She grasps the bottle and breaks it into many

The war is over. Harris' friends return and refuse to notice him, believing him a coward. At a dinner, in celebration of the victory, all his former friends spurn him. His wife notices this and is sorry at heart. She resolves to tell them the truth—that her husband is not a coward, but has won a greater victory than any of them. This done, Harris is hailed as a hero.

Marks' perfidy is discovered and he is glad to slink away unmolested.

THE MILL STREAM (Two Parts—Dec. 14).—Jack Thornby, owner of a small grist mill, is in love with Mary, the daughter of his mill foreman, Dan Wheatly. While inspecting the spillway which carries off the overflow of the mill race, Jack finds Tom Craven, a wealthy young business man from the city, sitting beside the trout stream nursing a sprained ankle. Craven has been spending his vacation in the country fishing. A misstep while whipping the stream for trout results in a painful but not serious injury to his foot. Jack takes the young man to his home and applies a poultice which quickly relieves Tom's pain. Mary is introduced to Tom. His polished ways and refined manner as contrasted with Jack's hearty manners, result in poor Jack being neglected by his old sweetheart.

Jack's jealousy is aroused and the young men finally come to blows over Mary. The quarrel is seen by the mill watchman. Next day Tom's body is found in the mill stream with stab wounds in back and chest. Jack is arrested and accused of having killed his rival for Mary's hand. Soon afterward he is sentenced to twenty years at hard labor. Months later Mary is rowing in the mill stream when she comes upon the body of a poorly-dressed man in the bushes along the shore of the stream. While trying to drag the body nearer the bank, her hand comes in contact with a bulky object protruding from the dead man's pocket. This proves to be a pocketbook which by the size and shape she recognizes as Tom's.

Investigation disclosed that the tramp evidently had seen Tom place money in his wallet, waylaid him and in the scuffle which undoubtedly followed, stabbed him to death. In trying to escape the tramp presumably stumbled and fell into the mill stream. Stunned by his fall, or unable to swim, the tramp drowned with the fruit of his robbery still upon him. Upon consideration of this new evidence, Jack is released from prison and eventually pardoned. Later he and Mary are wedded.

WITHIN THE GATES OF PARADISE (Two Parts—Dec. 17). The European war has thrown Tom Hayes, a factory hand, out of work. The great mill in which he has been employed is shut down because of general industrial depression. With a wife, a boy and girl, to support, Hayes is desperate. Sickness has prevented him from saving money and prospects for a cheery Yuletide are slim, indeed, for his little family. As Christmas Day approaches Hayes is made even more downhearted by overhearing the plans of his children who are sure that Santa Claus will not overlook them on his annual visit. Their childish prattle of the gifts which the children in the great mansion on top of the hill expect adds to the poor millhand's misery, and he determines to be revenged upon the employer who has thrown him out of work.

In the mill owner's home, however, there is Christmas good cheer in abundance. The stockings of the millionaire's children are well filled with expensive presents and in the kitchen of his home the butler, housekeeper and chef plan the feast of the day. Through the windows of the mansion the millhand's children sees the glorious tree spangled with gilded baubles and, believing that Santa Claus could have no possible objection to their sharing in the plentiful gifts he has given to their more fortunate playmates, brother and sister enter the great manse.

The little girl immediately appropriates a great doll which walks, rolls its eyes and, by means of a phonographic arrangement, even talks. While she dozes before the great Yule log fire her tiny brother examines a rifle which lies beneath the Christmas tree. As he fingers the trigger of the dangerous toy he sees a window open. A moment later a masked man enters and the child, believing he can save the presents from being stolen, fires point blank at the intruder. The supposed burglar's mask falls from his face and the child recognizes his father. The shot, however, has aroused the house and a moment later the mill owner, his wife and children rush into the great library and seize Tom Hayes.

Mrs. Hayes, knowing of her husband's desperation and fearing that he would make some such attempt to secure Christmas presents for their children, runs into the mansion and pleads forgiveness for her husband. The mill owner, obdurate at first, finally relents. Hayes' wounded hand is dressed and he is sent home. Next day the mill owner's butler enters the humble Hayes cottage in the valley loaded down with presents which he gravely assures the children were left by mistake in the manse on the hill. Best of all, however, he gives their father a note assuring him employment at clerical work in the factory until good times return.

DOROTHY IN THE GARRET (Dec. 13).—Old Maid Dorothy, stooping low, goes to the attic of her home, and in an old chest and by the sight of the old spinning wheel, finds traces of the old days. She brings to mind visions of her youth and the cause of her being still an old maid.

In love with Benjie, of the same village, she was happy, as they went to school hand in hand. Grown to young manhood and maidenhood, they still were in love and planned a future of happiness together.

"But once, with angry words they part," and Dorothy, repentant, watches and waits by the empty gate for Benjie, who comes no more. Then she hears, one day, of his marriage to another.

Years pass and Benjie, successful in business, has grown old and crabbed and wrinkled, while Dorothy sits among her attic treasures, still sweet faced and kindly eyed, content in her faithfulness to her lost love.

AT DAWN (Dec. 15).—Sykes, an American engaged to a poor girl, goes to the Philippines as a teacher, and the girl stays behind to await their marraige. Sykes, after some time has passed, has succumbed to the tropic influences, and is living with a native girl, when one day he hears from the girl back home that she is coming to join him and that she will arrive at dawn next day. An aunt has died and left her a lot of money. Caring more for this coin that the girl, Sykes tries to get rid of the native girl, but she makes a row, and he in fear of losing his girl and her cash, poisons the native girl, who dies. He is about to get rid of the body when a young lieutenant of the U. S. Army shows up with his sergeant, inquiring the way to the trail of Indians, and becomes suspicious of Sykes' uneasiness and finds the dead girl. Sykes explains the circumstances and says: "What's another Filipino more or less?" He implies to the lieutenant that when he has been so long there as he has he'll understand better, and says that his United States girl was coming at dawn to marry him, so he had to get rid of his native girl. The officer indicates that he is up to some scheme and tells Sykes to take his sergeant and point out the trail for him, which he indicates starts at a

THE JOKE OF YELLENTOWN (Dec. 16).—The new minister en route to a new Western town to preach loses one of his suit cases containing his clerical robes. It is found on the road by Pete and Ike, cowboys of the Bar X Ranch, who decide to play a huge joke on the boys of their town. Dressing themselves in the clerical robes, and shaving off their mustaches, they appear in the town and call a meeting at the town hall.

Announcing that weapons in the temporary house of God are anachronism, they force the boys to deposit their hardware outside. Then when they are weaponless, Ike and Pete throw down their guns on the astonished "boys" and, forcing them to hold their hands on high, relieve them of all their cash and watches. Then they give them all the laugh and the boys are returned their cash and are forced to "buy."

THE BEAT OF THE YEAR (Two Parts—Dec. 19).—The headless body of a young man is found in the river and Connors, a newspaper man, and Bruce, a cub reporter, are sent out on the story. Bruce wants to make a record and finds a white and streaked button. Bruce follows the clue and finds in a factory in L. I. City that two employees, John Joyce and Sam Leonard, did not show up for work that morning. Leonard is accounted for, but Joyce is not. McGinnis, a stableman, identifies a picture of a man in a group picture on the wall of the factory office, as one who hired a rig from him, and next to this man is Joyce and a girl, Helen Lister, whose photo adorns Joyce's dresser.

Helen tells that she was engaged to Joyce till Greening, the other man of the group, came to work at the factory and Joyce warned her against him. The night before the murder Greening had called and taken her to Jersey City to be married. He had gotten out at his flat in Manhattan, gone inside and then called out the window to tell her to wait at a hotel for him in Jersey City, but he had never shown up. Bruce then discovers that Greening was the son of a multi-millionaire and no one knew why he should be working in a factory under an assumed name.

Bruce and McGinnis go to Greenings' flat and have a run-in with the janitor and tie him up and later they catch Greening also. He escapes and calls the police and denounces Bruce and McGinnis as burglars, but they turn the tables again and take Greening to the newspaper office. They believe that he killed Joyce to get his girl, but it transpires that the man they have captured is really Joyce. Joyce tells them he followed Greening the night of the murder and confronted him in his rooms and forced him to promise to marry the girl under his own real name and not that of Greening. They fight and Greening is killed accidentally. He then threw his body in the creek. He pretended to be Greening in order to throw the police and reporters off the track and save the girl's reputation. A letter found from Greening tells that he was really on the square with the girl and meant to marry her and the shock of this fact being brought home to Joyce, and the realization that all his work and killing has been for naught, kills him.

OUR MUTUAL GIRL, NO. 47 (Dec. 7).—Our Mutual Girl was spinning along toward Princeton, on that day, recently, when it was the Mecca of all devout football worshippers—when she met Douglas Fairbanks, the popular young actor. On his invitation she got out of her limousine and into his racing car. Then he took her as far on her journey as he could and yet get back to New York in time for his matinee. This pleasant little adventure seemed to open the day propitiously—and when Margaret met Ralph Hamilton at Princeton she was in the best of spirits.

Though a Yale man, he showed her without envy the historic, ivy-clad buildings and the magnificent campus which makes the rival university the Oxford of America. As they were walking past Whig Hall, a young man sweeping the steps, raised a cloud of dust which got into Margaret's eyes and caused her to utter an angry protest. As he was about to apologize, his eye fell upon the Yale brassard on Hamilton's arm, and the humor of it struck him so forcibly that he grinned. Margaret had to hold back Ralph from rushing upon him on the spot. She dragged Hamilton away—but later, they were destined to meet the young man again.

They were seeking a guide to help them explore the buildings when an undergraduate introduced to them Aaron Burr Edwards. He was working his way through the college, once headed by two of his forbears. But, though Our Mutual Girl received him cordially, the two young men struck sparks instantly, as though the smouldering fires of ancestral hatred kindled anew of their own accord.

When Hamilton discovered that he had forgotten their football tickets, Edwards seized the opportunity to score a distinct advantage. He procured them excellent seats, and took his reward in sitting next Margaret during the game. Eli won—but Princeton made a wonderful finish when, in the last ten minutes of play, it scored as many points as the victors scored in fifty minutes. After the game, Edwards offered to show his guests "the Westminster Abbey of America." He took them to the graves of his ancestors. Before the tomb of Aaron Burr, young Hamilton faced his guide.

"You brought us here to insult me, did you?" he demanded, his eyes flaming.

The next instant they were scuffling and struggling together. In a flash, the historic scene between Alexander Hamilton and Aaron Burr on Weehauken Heights more than a century ago darted before Margaret's vision. She read in the situation the bitter fact of inherited antipathies. But, fortunately in this latter day instance, Our Mutual Girl was there to prevent disaster. And Hamilton suffered her to lead him away.

THANHOUSER.

WHEN EAST MEETS WEST (Dec. 13).—May was a very well-to-do young girl with an indulgent mother and a handsome sweetheart. She was an only child and used to having her own way in nearly everything, and though of a vivacious nature, cheerful and sunny, the indulgence of her friends and relatives had made her the least bit headstrong. When her mother decided that they visit Yellowstone Park, May insisted that her fiancee be invited to accompany them and succeeded in having her way.

Their trip was a very pleasant one, indeed, until May took it into her pretty small head to climb down over a dangerous cliff into the bottom of the canyon to see the falls as they looked from below. Naturally her sweetheart was appalled at the danger and insisted that she do nothing so hazardous. May became angry, called him a coward for not wanting to accompany her, gave him back the ring and broke their engagement. Then seeking a Western guide, she started out to make the climb anyway.

Climbing down the face of the precipice, one of the rocks which furnished her handhold broke off and she fell and would have been dashed to pieces by the hundreds of rocks below had she not landed upon a narrow ledge a few feet below her where her grip failed. Mercifully she fainted and lay unconscious on the rocky shelf. Meanwhile the lover, suspecting that she was carrying out her determination, was making haste toward the spot. On his way he met the Western guide, who was hurrying back for assistance. Together they returned to the edge of the precipice and with the aid of a rope Jack lowered himself to May's unconscious form, and after fastening the rope securely about her, climbed back to the top and May was drawn up to safety. When he carries the still unconscious girl back to the hotel, her mother, thinking him in a measure responsible for the accident, and knowing that they had a quarrel, orders Jack to leave the hotel, which he does.

When May regains consciousness she experiences a revulsion of feeling, but her sweetheart has gone. She is inconsolable until they meet again at Old Faithful Inn, where they are happily reunited.

tion was purely from philanthropic motives, she plots with Morely to involve the girl and her father in the counterfeit scheme and then betray them to the authorities. Linton visits a suburban police station, and in taking a stroll through the country happens upon the counterfeiters' den. There he discovers his protege and learns that the woman he loves has been the means of bringing her there. Linton is captured by the gang, and when he fails to return to the police station the officers organize a search party. They reach the den just in time to see Ida Dean save Linton's life from the assault of the infuriated Morely.

NAIDRA, THE DREAM WOMAN (Dec. 4).—An old scientist all his life has labored in his laboratory to discover the secret of the creation of human life. At last he happens on an ancient book which gives him the clue. And he brings into being a woman, beautiful but incapable of love. He shows her happy lovers, that she may see what love means. He takes her to where a mother is singing her baby to sleep, that she may realize how love finds fulfillment. Then he leads her where a father and mother are weeping together over the grave of their child, hoping thus to reveal to her sorrow and the meaning of renunciation. But the woman fails to respond. A young organist visits the scientist—and he and Naidra, the dream woman, fall in love. The old scientist, who has come to love his Galatea deeply, is filled with grief to see that where he has failed, another has succeeded. As the organist is about to kiss Naidra, the scientist rushes forward—and awakes to find that Naidra and his love for her is all a dream.

THE AMATEUR DETECTIVE (Dec. 6).—Jane and Pat, her policeman admirer, whom she has taught to believe himself a second Sherlock Holmes, think that they have discovered a blackhand plot against Mr. Wise, Jane's employer. In reality the mysterious signs they have seen on the back fence are Jack's secret language to Betty, his sweetheart, whom Father Wise considers too young to have beaux. Betty and Jack find out that Jane has mistaken their innocent hieroglyphics for blackhand signals, so they scheme to get father worried, to have Jack masquerade as a detective, subdue a bogus blackhand gang, and then, throwing off his disguise, claim Betty as his reward. Pat precipitates matters, however, by arresting the young hero prematurely. Jack is obliged to unmask. But Mr. Wise, seeing the joke, gives Betty to Jack.

ROYAL.

SHERMAN WAS RIGHT (Dec. 5).—An imaginary war is caused by an imaginary grievance. The excitement opens in the war office where a fiery speaker is trying to wake his slumbering companions. At last they are thoroughly aroused by the arrival of an elderly courier who has taken twenty years to deliver the war message One army is composed exclusively of married men, who are willing to die, and the battles are fought under the rules and regulations of the union. It is treason to fight after 5.30 on week days, and every soldier must be off the field by 1 P. M. Saturdays. Cannon balls are borrowed by one army of the other, and the climax comes with the breaking up of the death struggle by the wives of the married contingent.

IT'S VERY TRYING (Dec. 5)—A farce subject on the same reel with the foregoing.

THE PANTHER (Two Parts—Dec. 16).—Andrew McLeod, the Factor, is called "The Panther" by the Indians, owing to his cruelty. He wishes to marry Julie, the daughter of Francois Ledru, a French trapper. Julie is afraid of McLeod and rather than become his wife she runs away. Ledru is terrified when he discovers her absence as he knows McLeod will make him suffer for it, in which fear he is fully justified, as he is beaten and then shot by McLeod.

Meantime, Julie, in her wanderings, runs into Father Lezare, who is journeying toward the trading station, and also David Brandt, a hunter. She appeals to them for help and upon David's assertion that he will do anything to help her, she begs him to marry her. After some hesitation on the part of both David and the priest, this is done. McLeod's Indians who have been sent in search of Julie, capture the three and bring them back to the station. There David is tortured by Brandt and Julie is confined in a small room in his house.

About this time John Caribou, an Indian, returns from a trapping expedition, and, upon learning of his good friend Ledru's death, vows to avenge it. He pretends friendliness to McLeod, who tells him to give David a chance to escape with Julie, then to kill David and bring Julie back to him. John pretends to do this, but really does help David and Julie to escape. He then returns to McLeod and tells him David is dead. McLeod demands to be shown his body. He is led by John to the grave of Ledru and there a fierce struggle takes place between John and McLeod. John is mortally wounded, but manages to shoot McLeod while he is making his "get-away."

MOTHER OF SHADOWS (Two Parts—Dec. 4).—Laughing Moon, sister of the Sioux Chief, saves the life of Lieut. Eldridge, after he had protected her from a drunken Mexican. The friendship rapidly ripens into love. Some time later the chief arrives at the Post with all his tribe and Laughing Moon demands to see the colonel, whom he tells that Laughing Moon has a child of which one of his officers is the father. The colonel at once orders all the officers before him and tells Laughing Moon to pick out the man. She refuses to betray Eldrige but he admits it. The colonel demands that he marry her at once. This is done.

As time passes, Laughing Moon realizes that her husband is ashamed of her, and her heart is broken when she hears him say that he knows the baby will grow up to be ashamed of her. The Sioux chief, owing to the fact that his sister has married an officer, disobeys the colonel's orders regarding hunting, and in the dispute that follows one of his warriors is placed under arrest. When the colonel refuses to release him, the chief attacks the fort. During the battle the imprisoned Indian escapes and discovers a small wooden gate in the rear of the stables which is unguarded. He throws away the wooden bar securing the gate, and hastens to inform the Indians. Laughing Moon sees him, and, realizing the gate must be held, throws her arm in the bar slots in place of the wooden bar.

The Indians try to batter down the gate and chop through at her arm, badly wounding her, but she manages to cling there until a detachment of soldiers arrive. The Indians are beaten off. Laughing Moon is the heroine of the hour, and her husband is now very proud of her, and brings the baby to her, telling her when it grows he will delight in telling of his brave mother. She, however, knows that his first statement is true, and realizes when she is an old shapless squaw her son will be ashamed of her when he compares her to the beautiful white mothers of boys of his acquaintance. She feels it is best that he should remember her as a beautiful Indian Princess who saved the fort. She opens the bandages binding her wounds, and when they find her she is dead.

THE FORTUNES OF WAR (Two Parts—Dec. 11).—Carlos Romez and Pedro Cerveroz are both suitors for the hand of Pepita Hermanos, who chooses Carlos, much to his father's displeasure, as he favors Pedro. When the Mexican war breaks out both Pedro and Carlos are called to the front, Pedro being a Federal and Carlos a rebel. Pepita's father is general of the Federal army. While Carlos is on his way with important dispatches to General Villa, he is chased by the Federal army. Escaping them, he finds shelter in Pepita's home. The Federals, suspecting his hiding place, come and search the house. Unable to find him, they return to their camp. Pedro, suspecting Pepita of hiding Carlos, resolves on a ruse to learn the truth. Disguising a Federal as a Rebel by dressing him him in one of the Rebel prisoner's clothes, they send him to Pepita's home, pretending to seek shelter from the enemy. Pepita and Carlos take him in. While they are out of the room he goes to the window and gives a signal to the Federals, who rush to the house. Hearing the Federals, Carlos makes his escape, leaving the dispatches in his haste with Pepita, who realizes that the dispatches mean death to her father. She rushes to his camp to warn him of his danger. Her father thinks she is a Rebel spy until after she has explained her errand. He has difficulty in convincing his officers that she is not a spy. Carlo, fearing for Pepita's safety, comes to her rescue and takes her safely over the American border.

DOMINO.

THE VIGIL (Two Parts—Dec. 3).—Kamura, a poor Japanese fisherman, has arranged to have his daughter marry Owaru, against her will. Kenjiro, son of a wealthy Japanese merchant, is in a wreck at sea and is washed on the wreckage near Mira's home. She swims out to sea and rescues him. Later they fall in love, and her engagement with Owaru is sealed. Kenjiro is appointed "One Year Godmaster," a Japanese custom, which, although quite an honor, required him to live the life of a hermit for one year, and if any calamity comes to the community it is supposed to be caused by some negligence on the part of the Godmaster to his religious duties.

A ship from Asia brings the plague to this village and the superstitious people believe their sufferings to be a visitation from the Gods. Owaru, fired with jealousy, fans the fires of suspicion against Kenjiro, telling the lower classes that he is false to his trust. Chosing a night that Kenjiro's religious duties compel him to keep an all night vigil, Owaru drugs his food with a sleeping potion, and Kenjiro is found by the people to be false to his trust. He is later put into prison and sentenced to be flogged to death. Believing Owaru guilty of having drugged Kenjiro, Mira determines to impersonate one of Owaru's ancestors and play upon his religious fears, hoping that he will confess. She wrecks Owaru's hut and leaves a note of warning which frightens him. While running he falls over a precipice. Dying, he confesses to having drugged Kenjiro.

NOT OF THE FLOCK (Two Parts—Dec. 10).—Rod Rawley, a saloonkeeper, who has been driven out of the village, sets up a roadhouse outside the town where he lives with his daughter Leone. David Boylan, the new minister of the village, accidentally meets Leone, and, much attracted by her personality, seeks to win her away from the life she is leading. He invites her to a church social. She gladly accepts. At the social, however, she is cruelly snubbed, particularly by Edith Anisworth, the daughter of the village banker, with whom Boylan half believes himself in love. The incident, however, opens his eyes and he breaks with her. Leone returns home, broken hearted, and is about to throw herself away when her better judgment asserts itself.

A little later Edith is enticed to the road house by a suave city man, and here Leone discovers her in a helpless condition. Her feeling of pity overcomes her desire for revenge and she locks Edith in her room. Her father breaks down the door, but Boylan arrives in time to save the two girls. Leone, believing Boylan to be in love with Edith, leaves them together, but Boylan soon overtakes her and gains her consent to be his wife.

THE STRENGTH O' TEN (Dec. 2).—Betty, a vivacious girl of the hills, is courted by all the boys. But her unhappy home life with a drunken father leads her to try out every one of her admirers, and if a young man drinks she rejects him. Elick almost comes up to Betty's standard. But on a day when Elick yields to temptation, Betty finds him at daybreak, helpless to rescue her father who has fallen into a deep gully. Seeing his unsteady hands and twitching face, she shrinks away from Elick, while Jep, a young stranger, arriving on the scene just then, lifts her father on his strong shoulders, and with resolute step caries him home—thus winning Betty's admiration. Later Betty puts Jep to the same test as the others, but though she leads him to believe that she is in love with Elick, Jep does not drink even to drown his disappointment. The boys pick a fight with their new rival, of whom they all are jealous. But Jep easily handles the half-tipsy gang, proving himself an Orlando and a Sir Galahad in one. Betty joyfully consents to marry him.

OUT OF THE DARKNESS (Two Parts—Dec. 7).—Terry Manning and the "Wolf," Dan Clancy, are cell-mates. On being released from prison, the "Wolf" tries to inveigle Manning into committing robbery, but the young man is determined to live straight. And not long after, he gets a job in the offices of a large coal company. Here he meets Kitty Clancy, a stenographer, who is supporting herself and her mother. Without suspecting that she is in any way connected with Dan Clancy, Manning falls in love with Kitty. The "Wolf," meanwhile, has discovered where his family is living. He is ashamed, however, to reveal himself to his wife and daughter. Luck is against him, and Manning finds him one night, ragged, penniless and starving. He takes him home with him to his room. While Manning has gone out in his best suit to call on Kitty, Clancy finds the keys of the coal offices in the young man's working clothes—and the rest is easy. Making his get-away with the contents of the safe, the "Wolf," in passing the house where his wife and daughter are living, is moved to have a farewell glimpse of them. Peering in the window, he discovers that Manning is his daughter's sweetheart. Realizing that Manning will be blamed for the theft, and what that will mean to Kitty, the old man goes back to the coal offices and replaces the money. He is shot at and wounded, however, by the night watchman—and though he manages to reach Manning's room, the latter, on returning, finds him dying. Clancy confesses his relationship to Kitty and her mother, and Manning, at his request, sends for them. The "Wolf" dies forgiven—and Manning leads the grieving women "out of the darkness" into a more hopeful way of life.

THE NOISE OF BOMBS (Nov. 19).—The chief of the Keystone police incurs the enmity of a gang of Italians at about the same time that he fires a member of the force. The Dagos, coming upon the discharged officer, command him to place the bomb which they have procured for blowing up the chief's house. The officer, though sore at his boss, is not in favor of murdering him. But a few pistols pointed at all the vulnerable spots in his body, and the bomb thrust into his hands, tell him what he must do. He enters the chief's house—then, hearing the family come in, leaps into a box couch, bomb and all. The chief's wife, who is no fairy, sits down on the couch, and her weight causes spontaneous combustion of the bomb. Naturally, this gives the policeman a chance to make his escape. A chase ensues, and the unwilling bomb bearer takes refuge in a storehouse belonging to the Italians. Meanwhile, he has lost his bomb—it having changed hands too rapidly during his flight for him to keep track of it. In the storehouse he finds the chief's baby, and in restoring it to its distracted parents, receives the chief's forgiveness for all past offences just as the house full of Italians explodes.

HIS PREHISTORIC PAST (Dec. 7).—Weakchin, the tramp, falls asleep on a park bench, and presently is dreaming of the days of his prehistoric past. He finds himself in an ancient kingdom, flirting with one of the water carrying maidens of the King. Presently he is set upon by Cleo, the King's fool. Then the King comes and the fighting becomes hilariously funny. In the end Weakchin and the King become great friends, but the King's jealousy of Weakchin's attention to his favorite makes trouble. Weakchin throws the King over the cliff, and reigns as King himself. The old King, rescued by Cleo, returns and beats Weakchin over the head. He wakes to find a policeman clubbing him and telling him to "move on."

BEAUTY.

CUPID AND A DRESS COAT (Dec. 1).—Sam and Henry, roommates, are both in love with Ethel, the prettiest girl in town. She invites them to her party, and while getting ready that evening, Henry discovers that Sam's dress coat is ripped up the back. He has the bad grace to laugh at his rival. So, while Henry is in the bath-room "handsoming up," Sam helps himself to his friend's coat and hikes off. Henry makes the best of an embarrassing situation. He sews up the rip as well as he can, gets into Sam's coat and arrives at the festivities just in time to see his rival leading out Ethel for a dance. In stooping to pick up Ethel's fan, the carelessly mended coat bursts asunder, much to Henry's embarrassment. But as Ethel takes him into the next room and sews him up with her own fair hands, his outraged feelings are somewhat calmed. Then he tells her the whole story of Sam's theft. Ethel is a clever girl and secretly she favors Henry. So she manages to lure Sam into the garden, and on the pretense of being cold, gets him to take off his coat and put it around her. She then runs back with it to Henry, who meanwhile has found in the pocket of Sam's coat a diamond ring. He puts the ring on the willing Ethel's finger, and they announce their engagement before the whole assembly. When Sam recognizes the diamond, his chagrin is complete.

PRINCESS.

THE CREATOR OF "HUNGER" (Dec. 4).—John Boyd, a penniless young artist, paints a picture of "Hunger," inspired by an old blind man and his beautiful granddaughter. Boyd's fiancee, Ethel Stewart, is jealous of his girl model; and George Randolph, a rival artist, covets the canvas which he realizes is sure to make a sensation at the forthcoming exhibition. Ethel, on Boyd's refusing to dismiss Mayre, breaks her engagement to him and accepts Randolph's attentions. When Boyd falls ill and has to be taken to a hospital, Randolph seizes the opportunity to help himself to "Hunger" and exhibits it as his own work. The real artist learns of the deception, but his protestations are sought to be merely the ravings of a delirious brain. Only when the blind man and his granddaughter hear of the controversy and testify against Randolph are the critics convinced of Boyd's claim. He is awarded a large sum of money, and not long after he marries Mayre.

KOMIC.

BILL AND ETHEL AT THE BALL (Bill, No. 13—Dec. 20).—The Stenogs decide to give a ball and call upon Ethel to use her influence in getting Mr. Hadley to be the guest of honor. After finally consenting he sends Bill out to procure him a proper masquerade costume and notifies his sweetheart that he will meet her at the dance at the same time describing his costume so she will recognize him. In the meantime Ethel's fellow calls and would like to take Ethel but has no costume. Bill, quick to think, gives him Mr. Hadley's and runs around to get Hadley another one.

At the dance, Ethel's fellow is taken for Hadley and Hadley is taken for Ethel's fellow. Complications reach a serious stage when it comes time to unmask. After much trouble Bill explains how it came to happen and Hadley decides that in the future he will let the Stenogs have their dance without him.

BROADWAY STAR FEATURES.

THE TANGLE (Four Parts).—Lieut. Jack Bradley, 16th U. S. Cavalry, on furlough, a guest at Esplanade Hotel, Fortress Monroe, becomes engaged to Margaret Lane, a New York society girl, who requests him to keep their engagement a secret. One day, while playing tennis, Jack throws his coat on a bench on which Margaret is sitting, and in picking it up she finds a photograph of a beautiful girl which had fallen from one of the pockets. Margaret, who is of a jealous disposition, becomes enraged and making a package of the photo and her engagement ring, sends them to Jack without an explanation. Jack, mystified, tries to see Margaret, but she snubs him at his every approach.

Receiving orders to rejoin his regiment, he is forced to leave without learning the cause of his dismissal. Margaret returns home and receives the attentions of Col. Richard Everett, who is so persistent in his love-making he induces her to become his bride, although Margaret has no love for her soldier husband. Some two years later Jack's regiment is ordered to Fort Bunker, Texas, where Col. Everett is in command. Jack's sister, Emily, is visiting at the Fort with Captain and Mrs. Benham. Margaret, who has met her and recognized her as the original of the picture, realizes how foolish she was in dismissing the man she really loved. She seeks to meet Jack, but he, not daring to trust himself in her presence, refuses to see her.

War is declared, and Margaret, piqued at Jack's seeming indifference and fearful that he will be ordered away suddenly, sends word for him to report at the Colonel's office at once. Jack, unsuspecting, obeys. During a scene in which he learns the truth of their broken engagement, Major Prescott, an old comrade of Colonel Everett's, enters and warns them that the next time he witnesses anything of the kind he will inform the Colonel. The scene now shifts to Tampa, Fla., where the troops are awaiting embarkation. A telegram to Col. Everett from the Secretary of War raises him to the rank of Brigadier General and he recommends Jack for appointment on his staff as aide-de-camp. Margaret, now that Jack is going to the front, is more anxious than ever to see him and sends a note for him to meet her, as she has something of the greatest importance to tell him. Jack accidentally drops the note, which is picked up by Prescott, who informs the Colonel what is happening.

Jack and Margaret meet at the appointed rendezvous with Prescott and the Colonel near by, the Colonel ready to shoot if Jack transgresses. The tenseness of the situation is broken when Jack tells Margaret that her duty as well as his is to her husband, and says good-bye for good. As he is leaving, the Colonel steps out and thanks Jack for the honorable manner in which he has acted. The troops move to the front and are engaged in a terrific battle in which the Colonel is mortally wounded. Sending for Jack, he makes him promise to marry Margaret and passes away. Margaret, who is in New York, hears of her husband's death and becomes ill, constantly calling for Jack in her delirium. Emily, Jack's sister, knowing of their great love, wires for her brother, who is stationed at Santiago, and he takes the next boat home.

PARAMOUNT.

THE CIRCUS MAN (Lasky).—David Jenison, accused of a crime which he did not commit, escapes his guards and joins a traveling circus. Mrs. Braddock, wife of the circus owner, takes an instant liking to David and prevails upon her husband to give him a job as clown. Mrs. Braddock's daughter Christine, falls in love with David. All the performers become friends of the new clown except Ernie Cronk, a hunch-back who, himself admires Christine, takes a violent dislike to David and tries to kill him.

David later saves Ernie from a bad beating at the hands of a gang of rowdies and Ernie thanking David, promises to help him clear his name of the crime charge. Ernie's friendly feeling, however, is short-lived, for in a jealous rage, he writes a note to the detectives informing them that David disguised as a clown, will take part in the afternoon performance, but Dick Cronk, Ernie's brother, learning of the latter's treachery toward David, takes David's place as a clown, while David escapes.

Dick Cronk, who has learned to love Dave like a brother, goes to Jenison Hall, David's former home, and there confronts David's Uncle Frank, who he feels quite certain is the man who committed the crime David is charged with. Dick returns to the circus and tells David of his experiences at Jenison Hall. A few days later they learn that David's uncle and a notorious colored attorney have quarreled, duelled and killed each other, and in his dying confession, the uncle had completely exonerated David.

David, before leaving the circus, confesses his love for Christine and asks Mrs. Braddock's permission to marry her, but Mrs. Braddock, fearing them too young, promises David that in five years, he may marry Christine if he still loves her; so David leaves, pledged to return. Col. Grand, infatuated with Mrs. Braddock and who has been following the circus about, finally through his clever scheming and the lending of money to Braddock, secures control of the circus and places Mrs. Braddock and Christine in his power.

Col. Grand becomes abusive when his treatment is no longer tolerant to Mrs. Braddock and Christine. They leave the circus and return to their home in New York. Later, in New York, Braddock and Col. Grand meet and in a street fight, Braddock is arrested, accused of attempting to kill Col. Grand, and is railroaded to the penitentiary for five years.

Five years have now passed and David comes to New York to claim Christine. Arriving at Christine's home, he learns that she will arrive later, from a trip to the country, and goes to the railroad station to greet her, but seeing her in the company of another young man, postpones his errand. He later meets Mrs. Braddock at a telegraph office and she gives him a wire she was just about to send him in which she tells him it is time for him to redeem his promise and he agrees to call that evening.

Braddock released from prison, has sworn to kill Col. Grand on sight, and takes up a position outside the Braddock residence, and is about to enter, when Dick Cronk interferes and together, they go to a low resort where they can talk in safety. Col. Grand and Braddock meet face to face and Mrs. Braddock pleads with her husband to spare Col. Grand; Braddock does so and walks out of the house, telling them he is going to the river to end it all. During an altercation between Col. Grand, Dick and Ernie, Ernie shoots Col. Grand and when the police arrive blames it on his brother Dick, who at the trial is sentenced to death. Ernie later confesses his guilt and Dick is saved from the death chair. Braddock, instead of suiciding, reforms and returns a better man, while Dave and Christine, learning of the re-union of father and mother, once again don their circus attire and together in the sawdust ring, live over in memories the days of their early love.

MRS. BLACK IS BACK (Famous Players—Four Parts).—Mrs. Black, formerly a plump and good-natured widow, tells Professor Black, her newly-made husband, whom she adores and fears, that she is twenty-nine, instead of thirty-six, her real age, thus neatly knocking off seven years from the sum total. To further convince him of her youth, she tells him also that her son, John, whom he has never seen, is aged ten, when "Little Johnny" is in reality a husky young fellow of seventeen, in school in England. He is fully six feet tall, broad shouldered, and quite up to date, even to his Irish valet, Larry McManus. Not being able to tell the Professor this, Mrs. Black invents a mythical "Aunt Prue," living in New England, with whom Johnny is supposed to be staying. The professor has to curb his impatience to see his new son, and meanwhile vents his fondness in buying toys for "the child." So does the Professor's class of gushing young girls, who look forward with equal eagerness to seeing "Professor's Little Johnny." In order to regain the slimness of her youth, Mrs. Black takes reducing exercises from a physical culture teacher, Tom Larkey, but loses more money and patience than flesh. As Son Johnny writes he is in need of money, and wants to come home, she takes the four hundred dollars due Larkey, which she sends to her beloved offspring, telling him he must stay in lEngland, and finish his college course. The professor decides he needs building up, and sends for an instructor to teach him the proper exercises. The instructor proves to be Larkey, who adds to Mrs. Black's troubles by hounding her for the debt due him. Meanwhile her son has promptly lost the money sent him in poker, and gives a Spaniard an I O U for four hundred dollars on the back of an envelope addressed to his mother, Mrs. Black. Pedro, the Spaniard, coming to America, decides to look up Mrs. Black, and, finding her, demands the four hundred owed him by her son; so all her ingenuity is taxed to dodge the two creditors and keep her husband away from them until she shall find some means of obtaining the money due. Son John falls in love with a pretty girl in England and follows her to America, telegraphing his mother on his arrival in New York that he will soon be with her. And Mrs. Black has just learned from her dignified husband that he never forgives a liar! Then things begin to happen, with Mrs. Black as the prime factor. Jack and his valet arrive; the valet is presented as "Aunt Prue's" husband, and Jack masquerades first as the gas man and finally as Lizzie, the new cook. Of course the fatal truth at last comes out, and the penitent Mrs. Black leaps into an auto, about which she understands nothing, and runs away. Her frantic husband sees the machine smash, and when, after believing her gone from him forever, he learns that she escaped injury, he is so glad to find "Mrs. Black is Back," that he readily forgives her deception and welcomes son Jack.

FALSE COLORS (Bosworth—Five Parts)—Dec. 17.—Lloyd Phillips, a noted actor, has just concluded the performance of a new play in one of New York's leading theaters in 1895, and in which he has made an unqualified hit. Congratulations are heard on all sides, but in the midst of all the excitement he takes time to send a telegram to his wife.

Just as the producer, Mark Herbert, is telling Lloyd Phillips of his great success, a message arrives which says that a baby girl was born but that his wife is sinking in health rapidly. Phillips does not stop to hear anything more but rushes away to be at the bedside of his wife. He, however, arrives too late. The great love he bore for his wife overcomes him and he experiences a great aversion for the newborn infant. He cannot even bear the sight of his little daughter and makes arrangements to leave at once, sending word to the manager that he will never act again. He places the infant in the care of the housekeeper and her husband, the butler, who have a young son named Bert, and tells them that he will send money each week to provide for the child's needs. After making final arrangements, he takes up his hermitage on a lonely island.

Mrs. Moore, the maid at the theater, is a humble admirer of the noted actor. She has an invalid husband. One day she thoughtlessly leaves her purse which contains the key to the box wherein she keeps clippings of the actor. While she is in an adjoining room, putting their daughter to bed, he seizes the box, unlocks it and looks over the contents. He calls her. A short scene occurs in which he accuses her of being in love with the actor. He goes into a violent rage and in his excitement he is suddenly seized with an epileptic fit in which he dies.

The next scenes are eighteen years later. The housekeeper and her husband are a very dishonest couple and they use the money which has been sent them regularly for the care and education of Lloyd Phillip's daughter for the education of their own son Bert, whom they have sent to college. They let the house go to ruin and we see the son returning from college—a regular fop. He shows great disgust at the appearance of his parents, the husband being a regular drunkard and sot. While the mother and son are discussing matters, the husband, in one of his drunken spells, accuses his wife and son of using the money which Lloyd Phillips has sent for the education of his daughter. The actor's daughter (Dixie) overhears the conversation and that night she runs away. The next morning a letter is received from the actor saying he will return home, and at the same time the housekeeper finds the note which Dixie left.

Fearful as to what the actor will say, the housekeeper and her husband turn to their son for his advice. He thinks of a scheme in which he will get some girl to impersonate Dixie—marry her, and so get the money which is Dixie's by right. The scheme looks good to him and he sends word to an old sweetheart of his who works in a department store to come at once and marry him. This girl, Florence Moore, is the now grown daughter of Mrs. Moore, the theater maid. Reaching the city, Dixie sees in the papers that the old play in which her father starred is to be revived, and thinking that perhaps they may remember her, she goes to the theater and interviews her father's former manager. He gives her the chance she wishes and places her in the cast of the revived play.

The story then goes back to the old house, and we find the housekeeper and her husband trying to make the place look neater. Their son, Bert, has now married his old sweetheart and brings her to the house to impersonate Dixie when Lloyd Phillips returns. When Flo realizes that she is expected to impersonate Dixie, she rebels, but they tell her she has gone too far now to back out and she is terror-stricken and sorrowful. Bert, however, assures her that Dixie is dead and she finally agrees to the deception. In the meantime, Dixie is playing a part in the revival of her father's play, and Mrs. Moore, in looking over the program recognizes her name as the same as the one of the former star whom she so greatly admired. She makes friends with Dixie and tells her she knew her father very well. Dixie is greatly interested, and after a short friendship, goes to live with the maid.

Lloyd Phillips returns home and Flo is introduced as his daughter. He becomes very fond of her and they take long walks together. Bert becomes very impatient and attempts to hasten matters by announcing that Flo has promised to marry him. Flo suddenly realizes that association with Lloyd Phillips has made her husband and his family distasteful to her. A scene is precipitated in which their marriage is discovered and in anger Phillips leaves.

Back in the theater—Dixie has given promise of talent and is encouraged by Lloyd Phillips, former manager, who, hearing that Phillips has returned home, sends him word of Dixie's success. Upon receipt of this letter, Lloyd Phillips realizes that there has been some imposition and goes at once to see his real daughter. He arrives at the theater too late, however, to meet her and the manager takes him to the cheap lodging house where Dixie lives with Mrs. Moore.

Flo, alive to the character of her husband and his family, has left them and comes home to her mother. There Lloyd Phillips finds the three women, and his true daughter is made known to him. He offers to make amends, but Dixie says he went his own way for nineteen years and now she will go hers. He leaves for his island, but a new vision has replaced the old. He cannot forget Flo. They are brought together again by the death of Mrs. Moore, who, seeing how affairs are between Flo and Phillips, commissions the former to take her loved box of clippings to the actor, on her death. Flo is free, her husband having been killed while burglarizing a house, and a reconciliation with Phillips, and another between Dixie and her father ends the play.

UNIVERSAL SPECIAL RELEASE.

THE MASTER KEY (No. 2) (Rel-week of Nov. 23—Two Parts).—Many a man writes down on paper the things he cannot articulate. James Gallon, dreaming of two women, taciturn and silent as he was, wrote down the thoughts which he could not express in speech. His diary, well thumbed, held the history of many a lonely night; but of all these nights there was one that stood out in his mind:

It was the darkness enclosing a woman on a bed. He still heard her whispered cry: "You speak of God, Tom; but I have no religion but motherhood." Before his closed eyes came the vision of a lamp lit -then almost an apparition—the face of his daughter. One life had fled, possibly appalled by the horrors of a world that recks not of our poor humanity. Yet there was in the dead woman's arms a child grotesquely asleep, as if unawakened mother had known.

"Ruth," he cried. There was no answer from in the darkness—but thus he had christened his only child.

And Gallon knew he was getting old. The problem before him was no longer dim and vague- as it had been in the days of his prime—but absolutely distinct and clear. What was to become of Ruth when he died. He sternly put out of his mind the thought of his former partner—the man—was he dead? If he had not died that night in the gulch—if he were still alive, knowing the secret of "The Master Key," who could save Ruth from his vengeance?

Then there rose before Gallon's mind the straight, strong, almost austere figure of his mining engineer, John Dore. Youthful, of course, but he had proved himself wholly competent in almost every task that had been given him.

And as though Fate desired to give further proof of Dore's manliness she arranges for him, shortly after this, a fearful undertaking. Ruth, while exploring the tunnels, is thrown into an ore car by a terrific explosion. This explosion sends the car on its downward flight out through the tunnel and over the trestle. She is in danger of tragic death if the car goes over the dump at the end. Dore, superintending the operations of a traveling bucket, sees her predicament. He orders the bucket swung loose by its cable and, hanging down by his legs, he swings over the girl and pulls her up to him, the car rushing on and smashing over the ore dump.

But what of Gallon?

Those whom we most want to forget reappear at strange times. James Gallon saw the ghost of the partner he had murdered on the crest of the hill above the mine they had discovered years ago together.

Yes, Wilkerson, the partner, was alive. He had continually searched for Gallon. In some vague way Gallon had realized this, and his fears had been summarized by the words written down in the diary:

"Wilkerson still alive by night. When will he come into the day? He shall never have the key that will unlock the secret to my little girl's happiness. I will trust John Dore!"

But it was no apparition that Gallon had seen, first on the crest of the hill and then at the window; it was really Wilkerson who, after one satisfied glance, rode swiftly away toward Valle Vista

It was midnight when he rapped at the door of the railroad station and called the sleepy agent waiting for the express. This is the telegram he sent:

"Valle Vista, Cal.

"Jean Darnell, Astor House, New York City, N. Y.:

"Have found Gallon at last. Address Master Key Mine to-morrow. Wilkerson."

Who was Jean Darnell? Well, she had a mission of vengeance, too. Incidentally, she welcomed money. Wilkerson had to have it if he ever expected to possess her. When Ruth came to make her fight, with the help of her sweetheart, John Dore, she had two crafty persons to deal with.

THE MASTER KEY (Episode Three—Released Week of Nov. 30—Two Parts).—Hounded by Wilkerson, Gallon is made to realize that his former partner is a real being and not an apparition. It is this knowledge which breaks the spirit of Gallon and prepares him for death. Wilkerson compels Gallon to employ him as superintendent of the mine. It is the last straw; Gallon sinks fast, and as his life is about to flicker out, his daughter, John Dore and the old cook are gathered in the death-room. Supported in Ruth's arms, Gallon writes his last will. It reads:

"I leave all my property to my daughter Ruth, to come into her full possession on her eighteenth birthday. I direct her never to let go of 'The Master Key,' which will make my little girl happy. I direct that my daughter keep Harry Wilkerson as superintendent until she is eighteen. I appoint as executor or this, my last will and testament, John Dore.

When Gallon dies Dore finds in the desk a sealed envelope, addressed to him, which reads, "To be opened on Ruth's eighteenth birthday—sooner if her welfare is threatened." It is hard for Dore and Ruth to appreciate all that has and is happening; much of it is a mystery to them. Vaguely they realize that Gallon had a dread of Wilkerson, that he had evidently wronged him, and that Wilkerson, in his turn, has a mission of vengeance.

At the "Master Key" mine matters come to a critical point when Wilkerson, now in full charge, posts a notice to the effect that "After this day all wages in this mine will be reduced 25 per cent." The man is after money—as much of it as he can get. He also sees that Dore is a stumbling block to his schemes. Of an afternoon Dore interferes when Wilkerson knocks a miner down. It is the excuse for Wilkerson firing him as the mine engineer.

Following this move, the miners decide to strike. Wilkerson's domineering manner has earned the dislike of every one of them. There is a fight in the office between Wilkerson and an old miner. The former draws a gun, and is only prevented from shooting the miner by the timely appearance of Dore. But the incident is sufficient excuse for the rough miners to seek Wilkerson's life. They secure a rope and prepare to lynch him.

Because of Ruth, because he cannot see murder done even in the heat of passion, Dore goes to the defense of the cornered rat. Standing on a box, he tells the miners in a few brief words the exact situation so far as he is concerned, begs them not to risk Ruth's property. For a time the men listen, and then they seem to get out of hand. Ruth climbs onto the box beside her sweetheart and joins her own appeal with his. And this proves successful, so far as the life of Wilkerson is concerned.

But the strike—it must be ended. Wilkerson realized this if he hoped to continue the mine operations and secure money; his life would be threatened at any moment so long as the strike lasted. It is a bitter draught to swallow, but Wilkerson announces to the men that the former scale of wages will be again put in force, and that John Dore will be appointed superintendent of the mine. He is ready to bide his time for revenge.

THE BATTLE OF LOVE (Essanay—Three Parts).—Arthur Chandler and Bessie Wells are betrothed, much to the delight of their parents. Vivian LaMar, an actress, is in love with Chandler and tries to win him from Miss Wells. He cares nothing for her, although she continues to force her attentions upon him. One day he has an engagement with his fiancee. He is late. She is looking out of the window of her home and sees him arrive in the automobile of the famous actress. The actress holds his hand a long time and refuses to release it. Miss Wells sees all and is jealous and suspicious. She sends Chandler away after they have a quarrel and he goes to his office vowing that he is through with all women forever.

The two fathers meet in a club and discuss the quarrel, both broken hearted. Jack Fixit, a friend of Chandler, wanders in. He lays a wager of $1,000 with each of them that he can arrange the wedding before morning. Fixit then goes to Miss LaMar and tells her that inasmuch as she has caused the trouble it was up to her to help him smooth it over. They concoct a plot. Miss LaMar goes to Chandler's office and, despite his protests, practically compels him to go with her in her auto. She takes him far out into the country, sends him into a field to find some flowers for her and then deserts him.

Fixit then telephones Miss Wells that the actress has been murdered, that Chandler is suspicted and all evidence points to his having committed the crime. Her body is found in a shack near where they had been seen together and Chandler's walking stick is found in her deserted auto, Fixit says. She telephones Chandler and when he arrives and says he is innocent, she stands by him. Her father, who knows of the plot, declares he will have nothing more to do with Chandler, and when his daughter refuses to give him up, orders both out of the house. They go to the home of Chandler's parents. Here they are also ordered out.

Finally they appeal to Fixit. He tells them the only thing to do is to go out in the yacht of Chandler Senior, that he will bring a minister there and that they can get married and flee in the yacht. In the meantime the interested parties are smuggled aboard the yacht. When the bridal couple arrive they show themselves and tell them it is all a joke and laugh at the unhappy pair. They are married, the bet is paid and all are happy.

THE SCHOOL FOR SCANDAL (Kalem—Four Parts).—On the eve of his departure for India, Sir Oliver entrusts his nephews, Charles and Joseph Surface, to the care of his friend, Sir Peter Teazle. Twenty-five years later finds Charles a wild character and a thorn in Sir Peter's side. Joseph, a smug hypocrite, is a favorite with the elderly bachelor. Sir Peter is captivated by Ann, a country squire's daughter, whom he meets by accident. Although many years his junior, the girl becomes his wife. Shortly afterwards, Sir Peter becomes the guardian of Maria, with whom Charles is deeply in love. Sir Peter frowns upon the young man's suit. Learning that Maria is immensely wealthy, Joseph resolves to marry her. Lady Sneerwell, in love with Charles, successfully conspires with Joseph and her secretary, Snake, to separate the sweethearts.

Meanwhile, Lady Teazle leads Sir Peter a merry life. Sir Benjamin Backbite, a notorious gossip, chances to visit the Teazles while Sir Peter is remonstrating with his wife because of her extravagance. After listening to the war of words, Sir Benjamin departs for Lady Sneerwell's home, where he finds the members of the School for Scandal engaged in tearing the reputations of their friends to tatters. The most harmless incidents are twisted and distorted. As told by Sir Benjamin, the quarrel between Sir Peter and Lady Teazle wound up in blows. Sir Oliver, returning from abroad, determines to study the characters of his nephews. He informs Sir Peter of his intention of meeting each under an assumed identity. To Charles, Sir Oliver appears as Premium, a money lender. The result of the interview between nephew and uncle finds the latter delighted with Charles.

Despite Sir Peter's friendship for him, Joseph makes desperate love to Lady Teazle. Due to the efforts of Joseph, Snake and Lady Sneerwell, Sir Peter is led to believe that Charles and Lady Teazle love each other. Sir Oliver, visiting Joseph in the guise of a poor relation, finds the young man an ungrateful cur. In the meantime Lady Teazle is induced by Joseph to call upon him at his apartments. It happens that Sir Peter, having drawn up a will leaving all his property to Lady Teazle, calls upon Joseph to ask his advice. Unable to leave without detection, Lady Teazle hides behind a screen.

She thus hears of what her husband has done to provide for her comfort after his death. Sir Peter's words touch Lady Teazle's heart, filling her with remorse. The husband discovers that someone is concealed behind the screen. He is about to investigate, when Joseph hurriedly declares that it is a French milliner. Charles is announced. Not wishing to meet him, Sir Peter hides in a closet. In the conversation which ensues between the brothers, Sir Peter discovers that his suspicions concerning Lady Teazle and Charles are unfounded. Lady Teazle, on the other hand, learns of Joseph's hypocrisy.

Charles discovers Sir Peter in the closet just as Joseph learns that Lady Sneerwell is calling. While the hypocrite endeavors to warn her away, Charles and Sir Peter determine to have a look at the milliner. The resultant discovery astounds Sir Peter. Lady Teazle, thrusting aside Joseph's lying excuses with contempt, confesses the flirtation she has carried on with him. Lady Sneerwell gets an inkling of what has taken place. At once the wildest rumors are circulated by the members of the School for Scandal. These have it that both Sir Peter and Joseph had been shot, stabbed or horsewhipped. The gossip-mongers who hasten to Sir Peter's house to offer condolences, are astounded to find him alive and well.

Joseph, arriving at Sir Peter's home in an effort to seek forgiveness, learns the real identity of the "poor relation" who had visited him. With the news that he has been disinherited comes a second blow when he hears that Sir Peter has consented to the marriage of Charles and Maria. As a last card, Joseph brings Lady Sneerwell to the scene. The woman declares that Charles has promised to make her his wife. Snake, however, turns traitor and confesses the plot to discredit Charles. Lady Teazle, giving Joseph and Lady Sneerwell a bitter rebuke, dismisses them. Realizing the many discomforts she has caused her husband, Lady Teazle promises to henceforth be a dutiful wife.

THE END OF THE BRIDGE (Three Parts—Balboa).—"Shark" Manning, a brawny, brutal crook, is chief of the Mudflats gang of robbers, and has for his leading aide a sallow, slim youth, Dick Brackett, the latter residing with his father, Silas, his mother, Luck Brackett, and Dick's sister, Stella. The home of the Brackets is a cafe and boathouse at the edge of the mudflats. The gang robs some railway freight cars, and Detective David Dale is sent to get evidence against the robber band. "Shark," Dick and two other thieves steal a $10,000 necklace from a mansion. Dale happens to see Dick crossing the flats, chase him, and Dick, fearing capture, drops the diamond necklace into one of the sloughs in the mudflats. "Shark" and Dick later try to recover the gems with grappling hooks, but fail. Dale, disguised as a stevedore, visits the Brackett cafe, and falls in love with Stella. Dick hears a street preacher denouncing thievery and resolves to reform his law-breaking ways and have nothing more to do with Manning's acts. Manning tries to kiss Stella, and Dale bests him in a fight. "Shark" is maddened by hatred for Dick, and has Dick shanghaied on to a ship almost ready to depart for South Africa. "Shark" then learns that a gigantic hydraulic dredger has begun work dredging the slough where Dick dropped the necklace. Dale meets one of "Shark's" pals, makes him confess the whereabouts of Dick, the confessor telling Dale that Dick is a prisoner in the hold of a vessel at San Pedro, and that the ship will sail within an hour. Dale and Stella then try to catch a train for San Pedro, to rescue her brother, but just miss the train. Dale and Stella then climb on a railroad handcar and speed away down the track for the wharves. "Shark," who has learned Dale's plans, follows them on a horse, and manages to overtake them while they are speeding the handcar across a railroad bridge, one end of which can be raised 200 feet high to allow vessels to pass. "Shark" fells the bridge-tender with his fists, operates the machinery and the handcar is caught on the bridge end, raising Dale and Stella to a lofty height. After many thrilling scenes Dale and Stella resume their race, rescue Dick and return home. "Shark," hunting for the diamonds, gets near the suction part of the dredger and is drawn to an awful death. Dick recovers the gems, and Dale returns them to their owner. Dick becomes an honest mechanic, and Dale and Stella agree to marry.

THROUGH FIRE AND WATER (Nemo—Two Parts).—Deane Maxwell, the daughter of a wealthy banker, is much interested in charity work. She contributes to the maintenance of a small orphan asylum, where she finds a three-year-old blind child, Ruth, to whom she becomes greatly attached.

In the meantime she and Philip Osborne, her father's secretary, have fallen in love, but for some reason which he will not disclose Philip tells her that he can never be more than a friend to her.

One night during a severe storm, Deane is roused out of sleep, and a vision of a woman she has never seen appears before her and impresses her with the conviction that some danger threatens little Ruth. She rushes out into the storm to the orphan asylum, finds the building in flames, and arrives just in time to rescue Ruth. She carries the child to her own home. Philip discovers them in the library, and confesses to Deane that Ruth is his daughter. He then tells her of his past life—a life of sin and sorrow, involving the death of his young wife and the affliction of his child. It is because of his tainted past that he has felt himself unworthy of Deane's love; but the vision of the dead wife now appears to him—the same vision that came to Deane—and bids him accept her love, as he has redeemed his past through sorrow and repentance.

THE BRACELET (White Star—Three Parts).—George Reed, a gay young rounder from the city, visits the fishing village where Ethel lives with her brother John, a fisherman. He makes love to her. She is fascinated with his manners, and consents to marry him. He seals their engagement with a bracelet of very odd and antique design, which he places on Ethel's wrist. John disapproves of Reed, and warns Ethel against him, but she will not listen, and when John becomes angry and denounces her engagement, she elopes and goes to the city with Reed. At the end of six months he deserts her. Overcome with shame and torture she goes back to her village home, and falls dying upon the porch. John finds her there. She tells him of her betrayal and desertion, and over her dead body swears vengeance.

Reed meets Mary Clarke, and becomes engaged to her. John happens to see a newspaper account of the ball to be given in honor of the engagement. This is the first clue as to the whereabouts of Reed, and he at once goes to the city. Seeks out the house in which the ball is to be given and finds Reed alone on the balcony outside of the conservatory, where he has just had a quarrel with Mary for dancing with her former sweetheart. Reed is found dead with a revolver lying beside him. Suicide is suspected, and Mary takes the blame to herself. Declaring that Reed killed himself on account of their quarrel. Overcome with grief and remorse, she later seeks the quietude of the fishing village. In a fit of despondency she attempts to commit suicide by throwing herself into the water, but is rescued by John. He falls in love with her, and proposes, but she tells him that the memory of the man who gave her the bracelet that she wears must ever stand between her and any other man. John recognizes the bracelet as the same one that Reed had given to Ethel, and he tells Mary of Reed's real character and his betrayal of Ethel. In the light of this revelation Mary accepts the love of John, and the bracelet, the cause of sorrow, is cast into the sea.

As the time approaches when Angie is to become a mother Williams is accused of his perfidy by Mr. Mackey. The result is a violent altercation, during which Williams strikes Mr. Mackey and kills him, Angie being the only witness. The murder takes place in the mill yard, and as Mackey falls prostrate at the feet of Williams Angie looks through the window of the mill and sees the crime. Due to her love for Williams she keeps the knowledge to herself.

cused by Williams. He is arrested, but is exonerated, and on his release he disappears. About the same time Angie goes away and leaves no trace. Meanwhile, Williams pursuades Mercy to marry him. Rufus, who, in his new environment, has become an inventor of note and has amassed considerable wealth, reads an announcement of the marriage. He finds Angie, and together they return to their native town, arriving on the day that Williams is to marry Mercy. As the ceremony is about to be solemnized Angie interrupts the wedding and declares Williams is the father of her child, and thus makes it impossible for the marriage to take place.

Williams then declines rapidly in the moral scale and his next misdemeanor is the robbery of the mill safe. He also decides to be revenged on Angie, and with this end in view he hires a gang of cut-throats to murder Angie and her baby. Angie is thrown into the rushing mill sluice, thereby being apparently doomed to certain and swift death. Rex, a wonderful police dog, belonging to Rufus, rescues Angie.

At this part of the story Rex takes a leading role, as he not only is the means of rescuing Angie, but he also recovers the missing mill cash box. He is seen taking this box from under a pile of heavy stones, where it has been hidden by the robber. Rex is then seen as the chief factor in a most exciting cross-country chase, in which he finds the gang of thugs in their retreat, which is a hut in the midst of the woods. He holds the men until the posse arrives, when they are arrested under circumstances of the most exciting sort.

Williams is finally called to account for his various misdeeds, is arrested and sent to prison to pay the penalty which is exacted for all evil-doing. The story closes with the death of Angie, her last wish being that Rufus and Mercy marry. She clasps their hands together and her brave spirit departs, glad of its release from the pain-rack body. .

THE STOLEN BIRTHRIGHT (Wharton—Three Parts).—Silas Haskins, a poor farmer, is made happy through his wife bearing him a fine girl baby. At the same time the wife of his neighbor and landlord, Singleton, gives birth to twin daughters. While Mrs. Haskins is still in a highly nervous and weakened state from her illness, a deputy sheriff comes to the house demanding that the overdue rent be paid under the penalty of immediate ejection. The farmer pleads for time, pointing to his wife's condition as serious. The deputy sheriff reports to Singleton the result of his call and is ordered to go back and get the money or put the Haskins out. Enlisting the aid of two other deputies, he attempts to forcibly eject Mrs. Haskins. Her husband enters in the midst of the confusion, and angered beyond all control throws the emissaries of the law out of his house. While he is engaged in this Mrs. Haskins, temporarily deranged from the shock, attempts to hide her baby in the bureau drawer. The child, of course, soon suffocates.

When Haskins returns he finds out what has happened, and in order to shield his wife from her insane act, decides to bury the child himself. While he is doing this, the nursemaid for the Singleton children wheels them in their perambulator to the top of the hill directly above the farmer. Owing to her carelessness the carriage escapes from her and plunging over a rocky precipice lands at Haskins' feet. Looking inside he discovers that the babies are uninjured, and determines to substitute his dead baby for one of the living in order to try and save his wife's reason. His deception succeeds and passes unnoticed. Shortly afterwards he decides to leave for the west and start life anew. Twenty years have passed and the twin sisters, ignorant of each other's existence, have grown to womanhood. Alice has become an orphan and is employed as stenographer by a young business man of her town, whom she eventually marries. Mary tends bar for her father, who owns a saloon in a little village in the west. High-hat Harry, a big-bodied, big-hearted gambler, comes to town, and being insulted by one of the cowpuncher patrons of the saloon, shows that he has also plenty of nerve by throwing the offender out of the door. He tells Mary that as it seems to be a nice quiet little town, he thinks he will stay. He soon learns to love the girl and tells her supposed father that she needs a protector, and that he proposes "to be it." When he asks Mary to be his wife she tells him that if he'll go to some big city, stop gambling, and be good for a year, she will marry him. Obeying her request he at once leaves for the east.

Registering at a hotel in an eastern city he is astounded to see a girl whom he takes to be Mary. Stepping up to her and asking what she is doing there, he is amazed to find that she denies his acquaintance. He follows the girl (who, of course is Alice) to her home and later writes her a letter recalling the past. Smith, her husband, reading the letter, is filled with unjust suspicion and orders his wife from the house. How the truth is revealed, husband and wife, and Harry and Mary all reunited, end an interesting story.

THE QUALITY OF MERCY (Two Parts).—Dr. Paul Deval, a young physician with every charm of character but with no fortune, is deeply in love with Suzanne Malinaison, the daughter of a wealthy man, and is in turn loved by her. Learning that her father contemplates marrying her to the son of a friend of his, the girl begs her lover to head off any definite arrangements on her father's part by asking the old gentleman for her hand. Deval assents and at once formally requests Malinaison for permission to marry his daughter. The choleric old gentleman spurns the proposal with anger and drives the unwelcome suitor from his house. That night the heartbroken Suzanne writes her father a note saying that because of his indifference to her happiness she is leaving the house for good. Then she steals from the house and going to the home of Dr. Deval, begs him for shelter. The young man at once sends for his mother, that his sweetheart may not be compromised by his action. His mother, when she learns what has happened, after some hesitation, becomes reconciled to the plans of the young people.

The next morning, when Mr. Malinaison finds his daughter's note, his anger knows no bounds. Rushing to Deval's house he accuses him of abudcting his daughter and then shoots him, inflicting a painful but not dangerous wound. Mrs. Deval, despite her son's pleas, lays a complaint before the police. Deval at once destroys the evidence by throwing Mr. Malinaison's pistol into the river. Then he goes to the police magistrate and in the presence of his assailant states that the wound was caused by an accident. Overjoyed at the young man's clemency, Malinaison not only assents to but urges his daughter's marriage to the man she loves.

A TEMPERAMENTAL WHIFFLES (Two Parts).—Here we see the exuberant Whiffles as a music composer with a wife who by herself would be by no means bad, but who with her mother (who lives with them) is like the little girl in the couplet—"horrid." Whiffles' mother-in-law does not like music, especially the brand Whiffles composes and plays, and is continually interfering with him in his labors. Whiffles answers her nagging with very apparent dilike and outspoken resentment. In consequence the dove of peace is a very unhappy fowl in the Whiffles residence.

Mrs. Whiffles' rejected suitor, Rollins, is still inconsolable over the loss of the woman of his choice, and like the moth and the candle, cannot forbear from visiting occasionally the Whiffles home in order to feast his eyes upon Mrs. Whiffles. Whiffles views him with contemptuous toleration; Mrs. Whiffles with what might be called an interested indifference, and mother-in-law with real approval. She regrets that her daughter did not take the other man.

One day Rollins calls and states that he is leaving for Africa. He has brought with him a camera and he requests the privilege of taking photos of Mrs. Whiffles and her mother. They assent. The older woman was once a ballet-dancer, and the idea strikes her that it would be a splendid thing to pose in her dancing costume. Shortly afterwards the amazed Whiffles sees her pass through the music room in an exceedingly abbreviated costume. His sense of propriety is outraged at the absurd figure she cuts and a quarrel ensues. She slaps his face. He returns the slap with interest and by accident hits his wife. The angry women at once pack up and leave, much to Whiffles delight. He immediately announces his house as for sale or to let.

Not long afterwards, having secured a divorce, he is called upon by a Mr. Brissoc and his daughter. It is raining and they have been caught in the shower with no umbrella. Seeing the "for sale" sign, they decide to kill two birds with one stone, and while getting shelter to look over the house. This is done. Whiffles and the daughter at once take great interest in one another, and when the Brissocs leave they bear with them Whiffles' own umbrella, which he is charmed to loan them.

When the umbrella is returned, Miss Brissoc requests her father to inquire the reason for Whiffles' divorce. Our friend answers "because of my mother-in-law." Miss Brissoc then writes a little note saying "my father is a widower." Whiffles takes the hint and the engagement takes place right then and there.

While the young people are on their honeymoon, Papa Brissoc wanders around among the resorts in search of amusement. By accident he meets the ex-Mrs. Whiffles. Charmed with her

Mr. Exhibitor:

In buying a moving picture screen several things must be considered:

First—Quality of the Goods.
Second—The Guarantee.
Third—The Responsibility of the manufacturer back of the Guarantee.

Another Manufacturer will sell you a screen at a Price perhaps less than the cost of Mirroroide. He undoubtedly will guarantee it. But——

Will He Keep the Guarantee?

Remember you are not buying a screen every day in the week, at least you ought not to, and you are not buying it for six months' or a year's use. Dollars are not so plentiful that you can afford to throw them away, therefore, when you know that an article of merit with a five-year guarantee against cracking, peeling, or turning black, said guarantee backed by a reputable business firm who have been and are still in business at the same location under the same management for the past six years, you must consider these facts and be governed accordingly.

appearance he formally proposes for her hand, and tells her mother that he can settle $50,000 upon her. Shortly afterwards they are married.

When Whiffles and his bride return from their honeymoon, they are disagreebly surprised to learn of Papa Brissoc's matrimonial venture. Whiffles' surprise is greatly augmented when he finds the new Mrs. Brissoc to be his divorced wife. Trouble at once starts with the odious mother-in-law, and is only ended by an ingenious subterfuge which our friend uses in order to rid himself of his tormentors once and for all.

WORLD FILM CORP.

THE MARKED WOMAN (Shubert—Five Parts).—The story of this release is that of the Boxer uprising in 1900; the coming of the American troops to the relief of the legations and the adventures of Olga Petcoff, the Nihilist. The drama opens with the peaceful little home of Olga in Riga, Russia. Her little sister is run over by Count Bobrikoff and his Cossacks. This arouses the hatred of Olga and she is easily persuaded by her brother Ivan on his return from St. Petersburgh to join the Nihilists. She is sent by the Brotherhood to China with an important paper hidden in the heel of her shoe, denouncing the Russian Ambassador. To escape suspicion she travels around the world and on the voyage meets Lieutenant Dare, U. S. N., who falls in love with her. On her arrival in Port Arthur she goes to the headquarters of the Nihilists and finds the Russian police in charge. She is saved from being sent to Siberia with the other prisoners by the Russian Ambassador, who sends her in a Chinese junk to Kan-You-Way at Nankin. On her way there, the junk is wrecked in a fog and Olga is washed ashore where she is found by Dare and taken to the house of Kan-You-Way. Here she meets Prince Ching, Prime Minister to the Empress Dowager and eventually is forced to marry him, to save Dare and the Russian Ambassador from being put to death. Four years elapse and she becomes a mother. In the meantime Dare has been unsuccessfully seeking her. Kan-You-Way, who has been thrown into prison by Prince Chang, is liberated by Olga and he, with his blind daughter, find their way to the headquarters of the American forces, who have come to the relief of the legations. Dare recognizes him and he is told that Olga is in the palace of Prince Ching. Dare takes a force of marines and soldiers and attacks the palace successfully. He finds Olga and her little boy, who is later killed by a bullet fired unintentionally by his father, Prince Ching.

BIOGRAPH.

JUST A KID (Dec. 7).—On the way to a barn dance, Jim rescues a boy from ill treatment by a tramp who forces him to steal. The adventure keeps Jim from the dance, and his best girl, furious at the slight, gives him the cold shoulder. But he, interested in "the kid," affects not to care. At last they are reunited by fire, when the girl is trapped in a blazing barn and rescued by Jim and the kid. The tramp, whose pipe caused the fire, vanishes from the vicinity, and the kid, no longer needing to fear him, is happy with Jim for a pal.

COUSIN PONS (Special—Two Parts—Dec. 8).—Sylvan Pons, musician and collector of rare art objects, lives with his friend Schmucke and a housekeeper, Madame Cibot. Near by is the shop of Magus, a crafty art dealer, who covets the old musician's treasures and bribes Cibot to let him see them. Pons goes to call on his relatives, the De Marvilles, and is first snubbed, then made much of, by the women, who, believing him to be poor, change their opinion of him when Monsieur de Marville declares that Pons has a rich friend who might marry Cevile. But Frederick Brunner, the rich friend, refuses to be a party to Pons' matchmaking, saying that he is too old to marry a selfish girl like Cecile. Enraged, Cecile orders Pons from the house, and this cruel treatment prostrates him. Cibot tells the De Marvilles that her master is very rich, and they come to see him. On promise of an annuity if Pons dies without making a will, Cibot puts slow poison in his medicine. She also sells some of his rarest treasures to Magus. Pons makes a will leaving everything to Schmucke, and thereby creates one of the tensest situations in all drama.

FOR HER PEOPLE (Dec. 10).—The art students invite the girl across the way to their party. She comes and they make much of her, not knowing that she is queen of Barsonia, living incognito. One even dares to fall in love with her, but her lady in waiting sends word of the danger to her ministers, and she is recalled. In her absence her cousin, the prince regent, has served the people cruelly—and she realizes what would happen to the country if she, following the dictates of her heart, should cease to be a queen. Then comes the struggle.

AND SHE NEVER KNEW (Dec. 11).—Once a year, on her birthday, she prepares a feast against the home-coming of her brother, who swore that day, so long ago, that he would return. Then at last there is a knock on the door—and he is outside. The gaunt, unkempt man she takes to her heart resembles the impetuous youth of twenty-one only in her imagination; but in so imagining she is happy, and fate decrees that she shall never learn the truth—how an old tramp took advantage of her delusion and then, repenting, would have broken her heart by going away.

SAVED BY THEIR CHEEILD (Dec. 12).—Clarence is in love with old Lockstep's daughter, but the old gentleman, who is crippled and wears crutches, has other plans. He wishes the girl to marry Richard Rosin, who promises that if Lockstep gives him his daughter he will rob a couple of banks for him. The girl, in despair, tells her father that she is going for some sausages, and so gets out of the house. At the trysting place she hides a letter to Clarence in the cranny of the old stone wall, and later he finds it. "Come and help me to elope with you," writes Maud, and Clarence obeys joyously. They elope, Maud climbing down from her room by means of a rope of bed sheets; but her father discovers the trick and pursues them on foot, while Rison rides a horse. At last the girl is captured and brought back. Meanwhile, Rosin, who is secretly married, has been neglecting his hard-working wife and child. Clarence knows of their existence, and sends for them while he goes to the Lockstep house to observe what is happening. The old man summons a minister and is about to force Maud to marry Rosin when Clarence rushes in and denounces Rosin as a married man. His wife and child rush in and confront him, and he is foiled. Clarence gets Maud and Rosin is reconciled with his wife.

Make them yourself. Written with pen and ink or typewriter. Three minutes to make a slide. Used for advertising slides, to announce future or feature programmes, for chorus slides when chorus slide is missing. We send four colors of gelatin. The slides look well and anyone can make them. They are handy also for announcing vaudeville acts. In fact, they may be readily used for anything you may wish to say to your audience.
For the sum of $3.50 we will send, by parcel post, prepaid and insured, the following:

REMEMBER DECEMBER 17TH

MinA Films are being exploited by the most gigantic publicity campaign ever conducted for a single brand of pictures.

Never in the whole history of the industry has publicity been attempted on such a grand scale except by three of the large distributing organizations, and they confused the public by trying to popularize several brands at once. MinA publicity is concentrated on MinA Films alone.

MADE IN AMERICA

For six months the people in every city in America—THE PEOPLE OF YOUR TOWN—have been reading in the newspapers and magazines of the actors, authors, directors and peculiarities of manufacture which go to make MinA Films different and better than any one reel comedies they have ever known.

This remarkable advertising to the public and to the trade has been done for you. It means ready made audiences, and a continued ever growing demand because honest quality of product stands squarely back of the advertising. Book MinA Films through all licensed exchanges, commencing December 17th and continuing every week thereafter on the

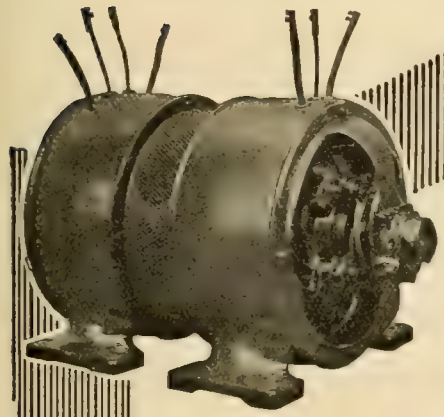
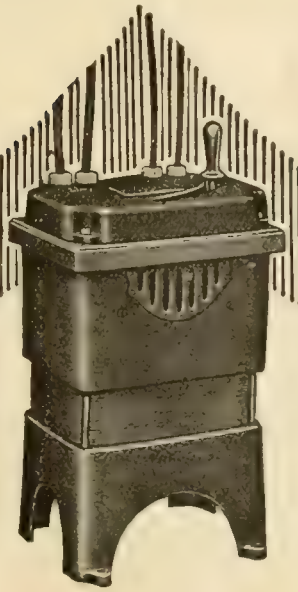
BETTER LIGHT

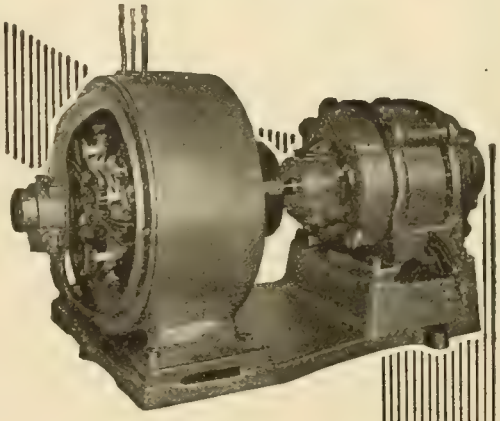
LESS CURRENT



The DC Compensarc lowers the voltage of a direct current supply to that required at the lamp without needless waste.



The AC Compensarc cuts ⅔ from your lighting bill if you use alternating current.



The AC to DC Compensarc will transform alternating into direct current and reduce the voltage at the same time without needless waste.

No matter what current you have---Alternating or Direct---or what voltage or frequency, one of the will enable you to secure a light that will give those clear, bright pictures that everybody now demands.

What's the use of paying extra money for special screens, projecting machines, and first run films and then spoil the whole result with poor light? With the Fort Wayne Compensarcs you can get any kind of light you want regardless of the kind or quality of your current supply.

The Compensarcs will give you

STEADY LIGHT. No flickering, no sputtering, even when changing intensities or from one machine to another.

WHITE LIGHT. No yellow streaks, no ghosts.

BRIGHT LIGHT. Three times the light with two-thirds the current.

They are safe, efficient, easy to operate, fool proof and reliable.

C-5

Compensarcs are so commonly found in motion picture theatres that many people now call all current saving and transforming devices by that name.

Stockton's Scriptwriting Service

To aid those who wish to guard against the formation of bad writing habits, or who wish to estimate their progress, I offer the following service:

Script Criticism For a fee of two dollars for each reel, I will read your manuscript and write a personal letter, pointing out the faults of plotting, technical development, manuscript preparation, etc. Sometimes I can help you to make the script salable, but I do not guarantee a sale. I do not revise manuscript; I do not typewrite it, nor do I offer it for sale. I simply write you a letter that tells you what the trouble is.

Plot Estimates If your stories do not sell and you want to know why, send me five synopses and one full script. I will criticise the script and tell you whether it is your plot or your development that is wrong. The fee for this service is $5 for the five synopses and additional plot. Synopses must not run more than 300 words each. Send a synopsis of your undeveloped plot and fee of one dollar and you will be advised as to whether it will pay you to develop the same.

Please Note My fees do not include envelopes or return postage. Send prepaid and self addressed return envelope and remit in New York exchange; not local checks. I reserve the right to return unread (with fee) any story or plot that does not warrant treatment. All scripts must be typewritten.

"ZUDORA" STOPS TRAFFIC ON SOUTH JACKSON STREET MORE THAN THREE HOURS

Read This!

The Monroe theater appeared to be the mecca of all the people in town last evening, the sidewalk in front of the show being completely filled with men, women and children from shortly after seven until long after ten o'clock. At one time the press was so great that Chief of Police Blunt had to interfere. The tremendous crowd, the largest in the history of the show house, was occasioned by the showing of "Zudora," the Thanhouser series picture so extensively advertised in the Chicago Tribune. The management states that over 1,600 people saw the picture, and undoubtedly many hundreds more were unable to get in at all. As it was, the show ran until almost midnight.

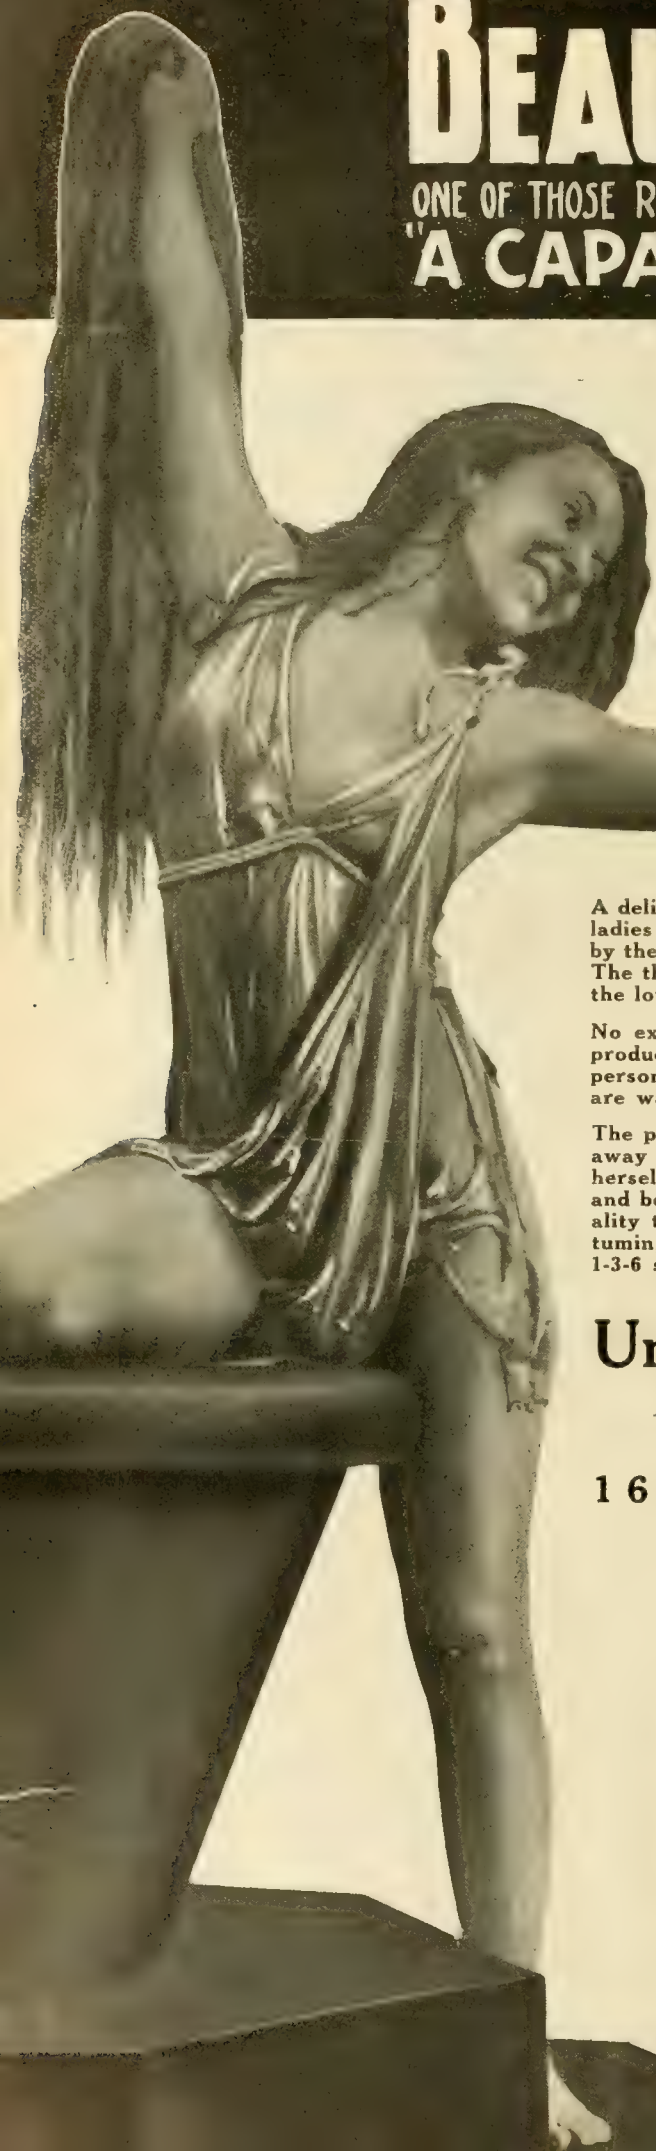
THE BEAUTIFUL UNKNOWN

ONE OF THOSE RARE SCREEN PRODUCTIONS THAT CAN TRULY BE TERMED

"A CAPACITY HOUSE ATTRACTION"



Featuring

Yona Ladowska

The Famous Russian Danseuse, Star of one of Broadway's Big Productions

3 Reel Victor-Universal Elaborate Costume Drama

A delightfully charming love story of a frivolous young monarch who loves the ballet ladies better than his Royal affairs of State. The lead in this production is played by the celebrated Russian Danseuse and Broadway Star, Madamoiselle Yona Ladowska. The theme of the story is beautiful and portraying what a real princess can do to win the love of a disinterested Monarch.

No expense has been spared to make this picture a truly elaborate 3 reel costume production. The settings are luxuriously rare, the action is big, court scenes, royal personages, etc., carried out with faithful reality so real that you utterly forget you are watching a screen production.

The princess in this story in order to win her royal husband must win his attention away from the Royal Opera Ballet, which she does by appearing in the Royal Ballet herself as the leading Danseuse. She dances at the Grand Fete at the Royal Gardens and bewilders the entire court, including the King, who does not discover her personality till later when everything ends happily. Gorgeous production. Elaborate Costuming. A genuine box office attraction. Released Jan. 1st, 1915. Book it now. 1-3-6 sheet posters. Write your Exchange immediately.

The Submarine Spy is a Re-issue,—distinctly re-issued to please the clamoring thousands of Exhibitors from all over America who have been fairly stampeding us to reproduce this wonderful subject so as to have some great big smashing War picture to show now while this European War is at fever heat. In re-issuing this remarkable picture we desire to say just this —Even if we were to employ our vast equipment of today with all our facilities and Stars we simply could not beat this film. It's a wonder,—packed with kicks—jolts—surprises—hair raising situations and enough of the melodrama to satisfy the most ardent lover of extreme stuff. We made this picture with a real U. S. Submarine, not a make-believe, not a prop, but the real goods. We show the hero shot thru the torpedo tube. We show the sinking of the vessel thru accident. We show the thrilling rescue. And the paper we have for this picture will make you hold your breath. All you have to do is PUT IT UP, the paper will do the rest. 1, 3 and 6-sheet stands. BOOK IT, and bill it like a circus. Mary Alden, Jack Conway and Spottiswoode Aitken in strong character roles

We have aimed to make Majestic two-part features (released every Sunday) of genuinely reliable feature quality—two-part features that managers can safely bank on.

Are we succeeding?

Scan the following list of recent Majestic two-part features and answer this question for yourselves:

"The Old Maid," "A Question of Courage," "The Sisters," "The Saving Grace," "The Odalisque," "The Tear That Burned," "A Flight for a Fortune," "For Her Father's Sins," "Out of the Air," "The Final Verdict," "Her Awakening," "For Those Unborn," "The Second Mrs. Roebuck," etc., etc.

MAJESTIC AND KOMIC GUIDE FOR EXHIBITORS

(In which we try to tell only the truth about all Majestic and Komic releases)

HER BRAVE HERO (1 Reel Majestic). Release date Tuesday, Dec. 8.—A fair farce comedy, but not quite up to standard. Hubby becomes a hero under false pretenses.

IN WILDMAN'S LAND (1 Reel Majestic). Release date Friday, Dec. 11.—A comedy drama quite out of the ordinary, cleverly produced and acted, telling a weird story of a strange tribe of wild people.

THE OLD MAID (2 Reel Majestic). Release date Sunday, Dec. 13.—An unusual artistic offering, especially recommended for the higher class houses, featuring Blanche Sweet. The "Old Maid" recalls the love story of her youth.

THE HOUSEBREAKERS (1 Reel Komic). Release date Sunday, Dec. 13.—Above the average Komic. Eddie Dillon as the timid sweetheart proves his courage.

AT DAWN (1 Reel Majestic). Release date Tuesday, Dec. 15.—A tragic story of the Philippines, from the short story of Frederick Moore, telling how an American's crime was sternly punished. Fairly well presented.

IN FEAR OF HIS PAST (2 Reel Majestic). Release date Sunday, Dec. 20.—A strong character society story featuring Mary Alden, Jack Conway and Spottiswoode Aitken. An escaped convict is almost forced into crime by an adventuress, but successfully resists and is at the same time proven innocent of the original charge against him.

BILL AND ETHEL AT THE BALL (1 Reel Komic). Release date Sunday, Dec. 20.—A very good "Bill" story from Paul West's office boy series, telling how Bill mixed things up for Ethel and the Boss at the stenographer's masquerade.

Flamingo's Welcome

From the way bookings for the Prize Comedies resulting from The Morning Telegraph-Chartered Theatres Corporation National Scenario Contest are pouring in upon SAWYER, the distributor of FLAMINGO COMEDIES, it is evident that one hope and need of the exhibitor is about to be realized.

The FLAMINGO FILM COMPANY has undertaken the ambitious work of producing COMEDIES of the HIGHEST CLASS, in which there shall be a story or plot of commanding interest, a continuous and logical succession of humorous incidents, staged in as sumptuous a manner as artistic skill, irrespective of cost, makes possible, the engagement of an ALL STAR CAST for its interpretation, and a director of highest standing.

UNQUALIFIED SUCCESS has, we believe, crowned our work. We are content to accept the verdict of EXHIBITORS and PATRONS confident that the quality of our first releases will positively assure the future of FLAMINGO COMEDIES.

Following "WITHOUT HOPE" comes, on January 10th, Caroline Wells' great FARCE COMEDY, entitled "PURITAN CONSCIENCE," in three reels of laughter.

On January 31 will be released Samuel C. Appleby's unique Comedy Drama in three reels, "THE SIBYL OF THE FILM," which, it is believed, will create a sensation.

The fourth release of a Prize Winning Comedy will be made in February. This is Roy L. McCardell's Satirical Comedy, "A JAY IN PEACOCK ALLEY," which received the first prize of $1,000 in the National Scenario Contest.

In a Four-Act Production of Sheridan's Great Comedy

The School for Scandal

The Play that has been Advertised for One Hundred-and-Forty Years

For almost one hundred-and-forty years, critics have placed Sheridan's "THE SCHOOL FOR SCANDAL" at the head of all comedies. Hundreds of thousands of people have seen the greatest Broadway stars in the many revivals of this celebrated play during the last few years. The advertising this great comedy has received, coup'ed with the fact that ALICE JOYCE and GUY COOMBS head this Kalem production, will fill every house in which it is presented.

A NEW KIND OF EDISON COMEDY

—the kind that makes one laugh in spite of himself—the kind that is really funny and at the same time plausible.

ARTHUR HOUSMAN
WILLIAM WADSWORTH

in "The Courtship of the Cooks" take the part of two chefs, each desperately in love with Widow O'Hara, the laundress (Jessie Stevens). She informs them that "the man with the most cash gets the widow." Then she tries to get away with the cash without marrying either, and in attempting to escape, runs into the hands of a policeman who proves to be her long lost husband. The merriment throughout is contagious. It's a film that will delight even a prosy audience. (To be released Dec. 30th.)

MORE EDISON COMEDY COMING—But this is only the first of a new kind of Edison comedy. Beside Housman and Wadsworth there are to be a number of most excellent comedians, including Dan Mason, Cora Williams, Bigelow Cooper, Edward O'Connor and others. The plots will be exceedingly laughable and altogether in this new kind of Edison comedy one may expect some ridiculously funny reels with clever acting.

Feature Spectacle of Beauty and Fun

Featuring George Hanlon, Jr., as the Clown

Released January 19th, through the General Film Company. In 5 parts.

Fantasma, the most famous spectacle and the greatest moneymaker ever produced by the celebrated Hanlon Brothers, makes even a better fantasy in the film than on the stage where it has been popular for 30 years. George Hanlon of the famed family of clowns, and pantomimists, appears in his original role of Pico, the drollest clown that was ever created. W. T. Carleton, the greatest Mephisto on the American stage, plays Zamaliel, Prince of Darkness and Evil, while George Schrode and William Ruge, celebrated in these parts, make the Imps a devilish pair. The lovely Marie Le Manna graces the Princess role with fairylike charm.

For over thirty years Fantasma has fascinated all from the child to the Grandfather with its wonderful blending of amusement and beauty, romance and fairy folk, visualized as only the fancy of youth can picture.

The originators of this famous spectacle, Hanlon Brothers, were known over two continents as the greatest inventors of stage tricks, effects and illusions which they always used with bewildering beauty of effect. The Edison company has preserved all the charm and atmosphere of the original production, adding new and surprisingly beautiful photographic effects never possible on the stage. Funniness, mystery, weird experiences, mystifying illusions and an unending panorama of gorgeous scenes in Fairyland are pictured with brilliant photography remarkable for color treatment.

Prince Arthur enraptured with the lovely Princess Lena wins her as his betrothed. But such bliss is not long for him, for Zamaliel, monarch of the infernal regions, sets his covetous eye upon the fair princess. Then ensues a mighty battle between the Prince of Darkness and Fantasma, all powerful Queen of Good and Light, who watches ever over the lovers. The Princess, torn from her lover, is carried to the lower regions and then under the sea where weird and terrible trials beset her. The Prince is ever accompanied by the droll Pico in his wanderings in search for Lena and they undergo trials and wonderful experiences. The lovers, reunited, sail away at last on the Sea of Happiness—one of the most exquisite and original effects ever introduced into photography.

Fantasma, in thirty years, made ten millions gross. Book this greatest of features and cash in on its undying popularity and appeal.

Facts and Comments

EXHIBITORS in Pennsylvania complain of the order of Censor J. Louis Breitinger in forbidding the use of six and nine sheets. Managers who conduct theaters on busy thoroughfares are especially loud in their resentment of the order and say that it means loss of business. While it is difficult for us to believe that business anywhere depends on the size of posters there seems little doubt that Breitinger exceeded his authority in issuing the order in the first place. A strained construction of the statute may seem to vest him with the power of suppressing loud and lurid posters, but the law is absolutely silent on the question of size. We hope that some exhibitor will have the courage to take the censor into court and test this question of authority once for all. If the size of the posters is subject to approval by the state censor why not the shape and the color? What is to prevent Fra Breitinger from issuing an order that all paper used for melodramatic films must be round and yellow, while comedies are to be advertised in octagonal purple? It seems to us that in a test suit the exhibitors ought to have the support of the lithographic companies who get more profit out of paper than any one else.

WE ARE glad to see the agitation for a repeal of legalized censorship in the states of Ohio and Pennsylvania. The campaign is in full progress in both states. In Ohio two things have been demonstrated beyond dispute: First, the fact that but few films need anything like radical censoring and, second, that the legalized censorship is a hardship on every branch of the industry. In Pennsylvania a prominent statesman has declared himself against the principle of legalized censorship and has thrown doubt on the legal qualifications of some of the censors. The president of the Pennsylvania state league, himself an attorney of note, will lead the organized fight against legalized censorship. The great meeting which is to be held in Harrisburg early next month will take decided action on the question of repeal. It is too early to venture any prophecy, but we may take comfort in the fact that in only two states has legalized censorship been adopted, and in neither state has been the result of public opinion. If public opinion stood back of these un-American laws it might be difficult to repeal them, but public opinion is strongly arrayed on our side.

THE Mayor of a Southern city is waging a war against the running of skating rinks on Sunday and includes motion pictures in his program of strict enforcement of the Sunday law. It seems to us that there is considerable difference between a skating rink and a motion picture theater. Loud noise has always been held to be a desecration of Sunday, but the judges of the Supreme Court in this state at least have decided that the motion picture does not disturb the quiet of the day. It is entirely logical to go one step further and claim that a first class program with educational pictures is beneficial on Sundays as well as on any other day. If the program and the method of presentation do in some way take account of the character of the day the motion picture entertainment on Sunday cannot be objected to either on legal or on moral grounds.

A FRIENDLY reader and subscriber sends us a copy of a magazine in which a reader complains of the motion part of his daily fare of vaudeville. He says that motion pictures are on the wane and that people attending vaudeville shows get up in disgust whenever the pictures are thrown on the screen. From statistics submitted to us by a reader who owns both moving picture houses and vaudeville houses it would appear that vaudeville is going back, while the pictures are making money. All the information we have been able to get on the subject would seem to confirm this view. We know that, in the early days, some of the vaudeville houses purposely used bad and rainy films to kill the taste for motion pictures and in some houses this custom may prevail to this day. As to the sentiments expressed in the article we can only repeat the comment of our correspondent: What do you think of that in the year 1914? There are people who neither learn nor forget and the people who cherish delusions about vaudeville at this late date belong to that category. The final victory of motion pictures over vaudeville in the contest for popularity was recorded quite some time ago.

Reviewing Photoplays

By Louis Reeves Harrison.

IN a burst of autobiographical confidence, Mark Twain declared that reviewers as a class were like sheep—the first one was a bellwether, tamely followed by all the others. The first reviewer of a photoplay is usually the producer's publicity man, especially when he has ready an insidious document, nicely typewritten, setting forth the merits of the release he is showing, but I know of few instances where he has imperiled the dignity of criticism. His synopsis, whether modest or lurid, is really helpful. It operates as a memorandum where a reviewer is looking at a dozen or more screen portrayals in one day, serving as a stimulus only to memory. I have met nearly all the newspaper critics of photodramas, and I find them well entrenched in a sturdy individuality of opinion. Their vision may be obscured or distorted by that individuality on occasions, but a large proportion of them are at all times fearlessly honest. They have to be sincere. If they are not beyond outside pressure there is small possibility of their commanding attention, to say nothing of respect.

Inside pressure constitutes a menace to their value quite as much as to their self-respect. Pressure from a source of the pay envelope to discriminate in favor of this or that advertiser is a bad thing for all concerned. It is demoralizing to the critic; it is unfair to other advertisers; it is a breach of confidence with the exhibitor, and it is opposed to progress in the art. Such pressure is not altogether unknown, but I doubt if it is ever applied by a manager or an owner of sound business judgment. The critic is either capable or he is not, and is, accordingly, worthy of confidence or not. The very nature of his work exposes him to attack from producers who consider the press review to be adjunct of their publicity game, producers who are ignorant of the fact that obviously biased criticism has no weight with those whose good opinion is sought, hence the average critic must be courageous as well as honest to stand a crossfire of opinion on his work.

Let us consider the case of a producer objecting to comments on his film by men of intelligence equal to his own. "What do they know about it, anyway?" he is apt to console himself. What they know about it is at least equal to what he would know about it if he made it his business to closely examine the merits, character and quality of a large number of releases every year, for the express purpose of exercising critical judgment. If such a producer would consider his own judgment of some other man's product, he might find himself more inclined to find fault than the critics he condemns. They are rarely given to censure. They await each presentation hopefully, rejoicing if it is good, glad to appreciate every fine quality it contains, and the weight of their opinion is nearly always thrown on that side when possible. They are not, however, given to indiscriminate praise, to loathsome flattery, such as discredits the paper in which it is published, injures the exhibitor who is supporting the paper, and eventually reaches the producer himself, when he finds out that his play is a failure. I do not know of any body of men so well equipped to safeguard the interests of both producer and exhibitor as an honest, fearless and well-trained corps of critics.

On the other hand, criticism that is honest and fearless is not always discriminating and not always just. It is more or less an expression of the writer's personality in all cases, and is entirely too individual when offered as a mere matter of opinion. It is all right for a critic to be an impressionist, but he must consider more than the larger facts. He must do more than mentally compare a release with certain standards and ideals. It is very necessary at this stage of the art's evolution to point out the "why" of certain errors and offer a remedy in the way of suggestive criticism. Then unsupported assertion savors too much of press-agent stuff to be convincing. It is even necessary in some cases to lay aside one's own judgment and consider fairly what is opposed to that judgment yet in demand for definite reasons. One of us may detest slapstick. Another may feel that tragedy should have no place on a motion-picture program. The larger question of varied program should, in such cases, displace personal bias.

"What point of view do you take?" I have been repeatedly asked. "All points," I reply to dispense with fruitless explanation, but that is only a general answer. I do not even feel critical during the time I am watching a screen visualization, because of a habit of trying to consider myself as a mixed audience. "What kind of an effect is this picture going to have on a large body of people of varied taste?" I ask myself. It is not to be forgotten that our people have now seen thousands of pictures, that they have enjoyed some of the best presentations, as well as suffered from some of the worst, so it is not to be taken for granted that they will become enthusiastic over any release that is narrow, weak or low in its appeal, that even falls below the average. As an audience, I prefer what is strong and intense, or what is bright, new, original and attractive to the eye. As an audience, I will come again if I get satisfaction, or stay away if I don't. That is a first point of view.

A second point of view gives consideration to the present dearth of good pictures, and is that of the exhibitor. As an exhibitor, I have a daily program to fill and, if I cannot get the best, if I cannot maintain a high standard, I should like to know something of the general nature of the pictures being shown to reviewers, that I may make selections according to what I believe to be the requirements of my theater. Is it a comedy or an intense drama? Is it farce of melodrama? Is it educational? Is it beautiful? Is it well acted? Has it a strong cast? Has it drawing power? Has it an appeal that will deeply interest my patrons and cause them to come back for more? As an exhibitor, I have to consider the location of my theater and those of my neighborhood or town who constitute the solid body of picture fans. The first point of view now becomes subject to a decided amount of modification, though its influence may persist.

Criticism has its compensatons aside from the splendid training it gives. There are shining moments in every critic's dark career, such as the discovery of a true spritual element in a story. When he is no longer dealing with misshapen images of lifeless clay, but with the fascination of a new soul animating the structure before him, then he feels a glow of satisfaction that irradiates his work. It is no longer necessary to consider the audience—keep faith with the exhibitor and disarm the advertiser—he may elaborate to his heart's content on a true expression of life or an artistic expression of life's ideals in terms that fly with wings of light. He need not, on that account, expect to be loved—he attracts no more affection than a dentist—and he need not even expect a few bouquets on his grave after all is said and done.

Padding and Puffing

By W. Stephen Bush.

THE two great evils now besetting the feature market are padding and puffing. Padding was practically unknown in the days of the single reel. The tendency was and really had to be the other way. Condensation was the order of the day in every studio. We gave the public the packed essence and scorned the thin dilutions. The temptation to "pad," i. e., to pile up footage just for the sake of filling, came with the multiple reel. I could name a dozen of the minor and a few of the major European producers who can resist everything but this temptation. We are not entirely without fault here—no, indeed, but we are a little bit more careful.

Nothing rouses the resentment of public and exhibitor more strongly than obvious padding in features. To use the same setting in one play as often as possible, or worse still, to use it in as many different plays as possible seems in some studios the wisdom of economy and the economy of wisdom. Half a dozen "extras" have been hired, it has cost a few dollars extra to set a certain scene. Why not use the scene to the uttermost whether it fits in with the next play or not? Thus, we see substantially the same scene in a wedding, in a suicide, in a comedy, in a drama, in a sporting event and in a miracle play. What if the scene has to be dragged in by the hair? What does a little incongruity amount to between friends?"

There is not an exhibitor in the country who has not observed and unfavorably commented upon the evils of padding. Patrons are not slow to complain about long-drawn-out films, and the one to face the complaints is the exhibitor. As innocent as a newborn babe he is blamed for the "padding." Some exhibitors get around the difficulty by taking the film in hand and trimming it themselves. Technically, this is wrong, of course, even if the removed portions of padding are reinserted after the film has had its run, but it is hard to blame the exhibitor. People do get tired of repetition and of long chases after the villain. I do not want to lay sacrilegious hands on so sacred a melodramatic "prop" as the pursuit of the villain, but merely venture to hint that there may be too much of it.

Where territorial rights are sold the temptation to pad is especially strong, for the film is measured and not at all weighed on its merits. A hundred feet extra, which may be "slipped in" without "anybody noticing it" means often ten dollars extra for each copy sold.

The exchange man or state right buyer deplores padding just as much as the exhibitor and the public, but it is only human nature to try and "pass it on." Aside from its annoyance to the patrons, I believe that padding is false social economy. A feature obviously compact and free from padding will, in the end, command a much better price and will, besides, establish a most enviable reputation for the producer. he market is choked to suffocation with dragging, padded films which test the general patience beyond the point of endurance.

Let us be perfectly good-natured in handling the other evil spoken of, i. e., "puffing." Puffing, it ought to be needless to explain, is totally and radically different from advertising. It pays to advertise, but it does not pay to puff." Puffing is wasteful exaggeration. The notorious puffer destroys confidence in any of his statements. Praise, even if it is not entirely justified, will be forgiven, but the man who is forever puffing his product in the language and after the manner of the side-show orator decidedly "queers himself." When we hear a man telling us that he is "shooting out masterpieces by the scores," that "he spent at least a billion on his latest wonderful production," and "that all other producers must hide their diminished heads when he begins to light up his sky," we cannot take him seriously. He may be adding to the gayety of the nations, but "he is putting nothing over."

I have often wondered just who was to be impressed by this sort of puffing. I have met hundreds, I might say thousands, of exhibitors here and abroad, and I have found them to be men either of average intelligence or better. The exceptions have been negligible. As a rule, they are excellent judges of films, especially the kind of films they want for their own particular audiences. They absolutely discount puffing of any kind. They know perfectly well the difference between puffing and advertising. Puffing may be compared to fireworks and advertising to artillery. Fireworks are interesting, but they never reach a target. The artillery scores hits. In the war of competition fireworks without artillery are worse than useless.

Puffing carries its own refutation. We all know that no single producer nor any single group of producers have a monopoly of masterpieces. We know there are, and humanly speaking there always will and must be variations of quality. Advertising must take account of this fact.

A well-known advertising man of an old-established company said to the writer some time ago: "We never send for the reviewer until we feel that we have something above the average." The company he represents has made most valuable contributions to film literature, but it has never permitted any puffing. The result is that its advertisements are taken at their face value. When they say a film has more than ordinary merit, they are right in nine cases out of ten. While new entrants into the field are often given to an exaggerated style of advertising, there are offenders in other ranks. Without meaning to be impertinent and entirely in a spirit of helpfulness we would like to point out that there is a force and emphasis in moderation and truthfulness which nothing else can duplicate. Exaggeration is weakness. Besides there is this great danger: A film which is advertised far beyond its true and real merits must act like a boomerang. Instances of this kind of retribution are not wanting. Films were announced with a great blowing of trumpets, every device of the skilled press agent was employed, the daily papers were swamped with advertising. When the public came they quickly discovered the real worth of the film and resented the puffing. After being heralded as a "world wonder" the film was quietly taken off and is now numbered with the snows of yesteryear. It is perfectly natural and even laudable for a producer to have faith in his own work. He must realize, however, that the intrinsic quality of the film is in the end the best advertisement. As soon as he has established a reputation for quality his advertisements need be nothing more than intelligent and regular announcements of his products. It would be the sheerest waste to load up his pages with superlatives. The readers will be delighted at the absence of bombast and give full faith and credit in the light of past performances.

Boston Ball a Big Affair

Second Annual Reception of Bay State Exhibitors Brings Out Throngs to See the Film Stars.

THE second annual ball of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Massachusetts, held in the Boston Arena on the evening of December 2, proved to be the biggest affair of its kind ever held in the New England metropolis. Only once before has the Arena contained a larger number of persons, and that was on the occasion of an address by former President Roosevelt. That even this record was not exceeded was due to the action of the authorities—which step was not only heartily approved but also possibly initiated by the committee of arrangements—in stopping the sale of tickets at 8:30 o'clock. As it was, the value to the League of the few concessions sold was materially diminished by reason of the inability of the throng to move about. The caterer, for instance, who was prepared to dispense confections and soft drinks, was much disappointed.

Ninety-nine out of a hundred of those present were there to see the photoplay stars. They saw them, they cheered them as they entered the hall, they surged about the boxes where they held court. They pleaded for autographs and they struggled for possession of the many souvenirs distributed by the women players. Outside the doors hundreds were besieging the ticket takers for admission. The latter were adamant. Only tickets would pass any one in. The situation was seized upon by speculators, who secured tickets that had been on sale in the theaters and disposed of them at $5 each. It was estimated by the committee that five thousand persons were turned away. Many, however, refused to go. They had come to see the stars, and they were going to see them. As late as 3 o'clock hundreds were on the sidewalk.

Of course, the feature of the night and the event that made the ball the talk of the town the next day was the leading of the grand march by Governor David I. Walsh and Mary Pickford. The governor took the occasion very seriously. He arrived at 11:30 with his entire staff, in full uniform, and headed by Adjutant General Cole. He remained until after 2 o'clock. He officiated as one of the judges of the dancing contest, with the brilliantly arrayed members of his staff on the floor just below him superintending the efforts of the many policemen, committeemen and seventy-five uniformed theater ushers in keeping clear the space for the competing dancers.

The committee entertained the picture men and the players at an impromptu collation at the close of the ball. One long table was spread in the main entrance hall. It was quickly done. By count there were 178 diners at the single table. There were good things aplenty to eat and plenty of champagne to drink for those who cared to drink. It was a meal that smacked of New England—scalloped oysters, turkey and cranberries and mashed potatoes, banana fritters, just to mention a few of the details of an occurrence at an hour and on an occasion when memory is not always over keen. There were speeches, too, and congratulations were showered on the committee of arrangements.

The Moving Picture World of last week told of the parade from the South Station to the Copley Plaza Hotel. There were thirty machines in line, headed by a band. From the windows of the cars candles of red fire sputtered and flared. These served to introduce to the crowds lining the streets the men and women with whose photographs they were so familiar. The slow drive consumed the better part of three-quarters of an hour.

It was about 9 o'clock when the players began arriving at the Arena, the great four-sided auditorium. It is said there are seats for 5,000 persons on these steeply banked sides alone. Frank Bushman, who had made a flying trip from Chicago, was one of the early ones, as he was obliged to take the midnight train for New York. Mr. Bushman had been given a hearty greeting at the hotel by his fellow players from New York. The reception at the Arena was one he'll remember. Others whose arrival was marked by hearty applause were Clara Kimball Young, who was accompanied by Vivian Martin; James Cruze, Marguerite Snow, Paul Panzer, Pearl White, Edith Storey, Hughie Mack, Edwin August, Hal August, Harry Benham, William Wadsworth, Arthur Hausman, Florence La Badie, Gladys Hulette, and Viola Dana.

It was 11:15 when Miss Pickford entered the hall. For a bodyguard were James Kirkwood and a squad of policemen. The box that had been reserved for her was on one of the longer sides, opposite the platform in the center. The passageway was narrow. When finally the little player was safely escorted to the Famous Players booth the storm broke. The dancers forgot their mania and crowded under the box. From above and around about men and women, and largely women, edged and wedged in. It was serious for a bit. Then Mr. Kirkwood suggested that the band be set at work. That helped some. At 11:30 the governor arrived. Shortly afterward he was escorted over to where Miss Pickford was still surrounded. As the two were introduced the cheering was renewed.

The grand march was started about midnight. Behind the governor and Miss Pickford were Adjutant General Cole and Clara Kimball Young. Then came the players and members of the committee.

For open competition on the floor of the Arena there were as prizes nine silver cups of varying sizes. Their names and donors were: Mary Pickford Cup, Famous Players Film Corporation of New England; Clara Kimball Young Cup, World Film Corporation; Ethel Barrymore Cup, Alco Film Corporation of New England; Gene Gauntier Cup, Warner's Features, Inc.; Marguerite Snow Cup, Thanhouser Film Corporation; King Baggot Cup, New England Universal Film Exchange; Miriam Nesbitt Cup, Thomas A. Edison Co., Inc.; Flo La Badie Cup, Syndicate Film Corporation; Byron Chandler Cup, Byron Chandler, Inc.

The judges besides the governor were Miss Pickford, Paul Panzer, Edwin August, Jack S. Connolly, president of the Boston Press Club, and Miss Hall. The governor leaned heavily on the advice and co-operation of the players, admitting there was a lot about dancing as to which he had no knowledge. It was after 2 o'clock before the governor departed.

So many demands were made on Miss Pickford for autographs she decided to sell them for the benefit of the Belgian fund. Ed. August took in the money as Little Mary wrote her name for her admirers. Mr. Zukor was made the custodian of a substantial sum as the result.

After the dancers had departed and the table was spread—it must then have been about 3 o'clock—the feasting began. Among the film men and exhibitors at the tables were: John F. Patton, Attleboro; B. M. Corbett, C. H. Buckley, J. Lourie, Louis B. Mayer, Boston; J. J. Meehan, Worcester; Richard Miller, New York; Oliver Edwards, New Haven; Thomas B. Spry, Richard W. Drown, Lynn; E. C. Duffy, Boston; E. L. McAvoy, Boston. There were present also nearly the entire list of guests from New York.

President E. H. Horstmann opened the speechmaking. "Our organization is but a year old," he said, "but it has done wonderful things. There are four reasons for this. The first is the hearty assistance we have received from the film manufacturers; the second, the assistance we have received from the exchanges; and the third and fourth are what have been done by the members of the organization and the committee, all of whom have worked so hard to have this ball and to make of it a success. I feel sure I am voicing the sentiments of the Motion Picture League of this state when I say we owe the manufacturers and exchanges a deep debt of gratitude. I am going to call for three cheers for the manufacturers who are represented here. (He got them, and for the exchanges, too.) They were in a position to help us materially and they have done so. I am going to call for a man who has worked for us 158 to 400 hours a week—he has been doing three men's work—Samuel Grant, chairman of the committee."

Mr. Grant was heartily applauded. He said in response he simply wanted to thank everybody for their help in making the ball a success. He called for three cheers for the film stars who had come to Boston. Other speakers were Samuel Spedon, of the Vitagraph Company; Frank J. Howard, who referred to his first experiences as an exhibitor eighteen years ago, how he showed 600 feet over and over; ex-Senator Gartland, who quoted the governor as saying just before his departure that he felt it was a great mistake on the part of the film men not to more generally acquaint the public with the real inside of their business; Paul Panzer, Hughie Mack, and A. Carlos.

Among the New Yorkers other than the players who attended were A. Carlos, Ad Kessel, Charles O. Baumann, Mr. and Mrs. Adolph Zukor, Mr. and Mrs. Jesse L. Lasky, Harry Reichenbach, Lewis J. Selznick, Jacob Wilk, Russell K. Dougherty, Abe Levy, Ed. Rush, Miss M. C. Kenney, L. W. McChesney, Mr. and Mrs. Bert Ennis, George Bunny and Samuel Spedon.

The officers of the Massachusetts League are E. H. Horstmann, president; J. H. Patten, first vice-president; P. F. Lydon, second vice-president; R. W. Drown, secretary; G. M. Clark, treasurer; directors, the foregoing and J. Laurie and Samuel Grant.

The executive committee for the ball was composed of Mr. Grant, chairman; Mr. Drown, secretary; Mr. Clark, treasurer, and E. H. Hortsmann, P. F. Lydon, F. B. Murphy, J. A. Eslow, E. J. Farrell, H. L. Kincaide, J. F. Patten, T. B. Spry, A. E. Lord, H. F. Campbell, F. J. Howard, C. W. Fraser, W. H. Bradley, H. Asher, H. I. Wasserman, H. A. Sivovlos, J. Laurie, Herman Rifkin and S. Levin.

After the Ball—and Before.

The trip to Boston on the 1 o'clock train on Wednesday was an all-around pleasant affair. The men gathered in the observation smoker. The imposed aridity of the atmosphere was moistened in spots by hip-pocket prevision. With this basic foundation the remaining highball essentials were cheerfully sold by the railroad. Ed August telegraphed ahead, and during the last half of the trip entertained his friends.

Big Hughie Mack is a real story teller. His chair at a table at the end of the car was surrounded by a party that voted him even funnier off the screen than on it. In his brief remarks at the collation following the ball Hughie intimated he had so enjoyed himself that if he should at some time in the future be so fortunate as to receive an invitation to a function of the Massachusetts exhibitors he would certainly be right on the job.

Paul Panzer was approached at the ball by an effusive sob sister of a Boston daily. "Oh, Mr. Panzer, will you autograph my program? Do you know, I think you are the most handsome villain I ever met?"

"What does she mean—villain?" said the Pathe player in an aside to a friend as he proceeded to fulfill the request.

The autograph craze was in full swing throughout the evening. Many of the players got an idea of writers' cramp.

One of the finest men you will meet in a day's travel is John F. Patten, first vice-president of the Massachusetts League and manager of the Bates Opera House, Attleboro. Mr. Patten is a former actor. Six years ago he retired from the stage, as did also Mrs. Patten, and went into the exhibiting business. Without having been in his house, the writer will wager a good dinner Mr. Patten not only knows how to please his patrons, but also does keep them pleased.

In the parade from the station to the hotel the driver of the car in which Pearl White was seated took a chance in beating out a motorman. For several mighty long seconds it looked like a smashing collision—a real peril for Pauline. Miss White had not moved. "Did I notice the danger?" she replied to a query. "Indeed, I expected the worst. You may take my word for it, if you follow me you will always have trouble." After the car had covered a couple of miles Pauline began to feel the pangs of hunger. "You know, when I signed this engagement nothing was said about doubling in the parade," she quietly remarked. Later, as she noted out in front the members of the band struggling through the mud, she felt compassion for them. "Poor men, I hope they have skidding chains on their heels," she said.

"Mary Pickford Charming Queen of Movie Ball" was the three-line spread head in the staid, conservative old Boston Traveler on the evening of Thursday. "Golden haired little Mary Pickford was the feted queen of the ball," the opening of the story ran. "Her dainty person, garbed in white, entered the doors at 11:15, when every one had decided she was not coming. Each of the 8,000 persons who packed the Arena either stood still and cheered her bobbing curls, or as a football team of one attempted to get through the lines over to her box." It was indeed a remarkable scene. Miss Pickford had never before appeared in New England. Standing just behind the booth in which she was throwing kisses to her enthusiastic admirers, one could not help feeling the power of the screen—and wondering if anywhere in any other walk of life there could be any woman who would be the subject of such an ovation.

The governor of Massachusetts is a bachelor. It may be partly because of this fact that the spectators cheered when during a certain stage of the grand march the governor and Little Mary were crossing the Arena with between them two dancing tots. The chief magistrate of the Bay State, with an inclusive, comprehensive gesture, waved his hand over the two little ones and his partner. The adjutant general, just behind, was convulsed with mirth.

Samuel Grant, chairman of the executive committee of the Massachusetts League, speaking a couple of days after the big event, said that 275,000 pieces of publicity stuff had been issued. Advertisements were placed in the Boston papers. For the first time in its history the Boston Elevated accepted for its cars announcements of a ball—only it was described as a reception. "It is probable that no event in Boston was ever better advertised than our ball," said Mr. Grant, who is manager of the Eastern Theaters Company. "We asked no favors of anybody. Our souvenir, you may have noted, carried no advertising. Our organization, which has no affiliation with any other body, is composed of film men, exchange men, as well as exhibitors. Our membership represents an investment of forty million dollars in theaters. We have accomplished some things which needed to be done. For instance, for six years we suffered under the notorious five minutes intermission after every twenty minutes' showing of pictures. Governor Walsh, our guest of Wednesday night, signed the repeal bill. Massachusetts is now the only state in the Union in which there is no adverse motion picture statute in operation. When we first talked of our ball the Boston papers did not seem impressed. But after the parade of the players and film men there was a change of heart. All were represented, some of them with four special writers."

The checking facilities of the Arena were exhausted before the sale of tickets was stopped. As a result some of the men connected with one of the concessionaires were seized with the idea that they would profit by the anxiety of intending dancers to get rid of coats and wraps. Their inexperience counted to the disadvantage of their patrons. It was estimated twenty-five perfectly good garments changed possession before the hall was cleared. Two men from far-off Brockton found themselves coatless on a raw rainy morning.

Dropped in on W. E. Greene, of the Paramount, or maybe it was the Famous Players of New England, of Beach street. Mr. Greene said he had not noted any diminution in the demand for features—that is, high class features. "My opinion is that business is holding up," he said. "In our houses we are doing just as much business as we were last year at this time. Of course, the service is costing a little more, as there is a tendency to increase the cost of larger subjects. This is because the manufacturers are turning out better stuff, and naturally have to be recompensed." Mr. Greene took the World man over to the remodeled Park Theater, which was to be opened on the 8th. The new managers have gone to an expense totaling a hundred thousand dollars in bringing the famous old house up to date as a picture house. The prices of admission will range from 15 to 50 cents. The gallery has been taken out and the balcony enlarged. An Austin organ will furnish part of the musical equipment. A gold fiber screen is in use and projection will be by Power 6A machines. The house will seat about 1,200, of which nearly 700 will be accommodated in the orchestra. Joseph L. Roth is the manager.

F. J. Peters, secretary and treasurer of Phoenix Features, and E. L. McAvoy, sales manager, were still talking of the ball on Friday. Mr. Peters, whose company has exclusive New England rights on Sawyer releases, besides owning outright many subjects, said he found business conditions most gratifying. The Phoenix is very pleasantly situated in a flatiron building at 131 Columbus avenue.

J. A. Eslow, manager of the New England Universal Film Exchange, at 1102 Boylston street, said he found business very good. "It is my impression that in this territory the long features are not as popular as they were," he said. "The serials seem to have the best of the argument at present. The manager of the Globe Theater in Brockton told me that on the last two days of last week he did more business with 'The Master Key' serial than on the preceding four days with a well-known feature. The serial to be successful must be of the melodramatic sort rather than on the society order.

"You know we have no lock system here. We exhibit our pictures to the managers before they book them. They don't care so much about the age. They select pictures to please their people and are themselves better satisfied. We show pictures here all day Tuesday and Thursday. Exhibitors make memorandums as to what they want, and of course they can then secure a well-balanced program. They can also avoid any particular film that may give offense to any of their patrons."

W. H. Bradley, manager of the Mutual Film Corporation of Massachusetts, with offices at 1108 Boylston street, denied that the film companies came so far out so as to be near the parks and the ball grounds. He said it was simply a case of getting outside the fire limits and into a building where a film company could do business. Mr. Bradley said he found trade conditions very good. The serials he said were going great. "The Million Dollar Mystery" had made a wholesale clean-up, "Zudora" had started out in the same way, and the outlook for "June" is just as big. At the same time it was his opinion there was no lessening of the demand for features. "You see," said Mr. Bradley, "since the Legislature killed the five-minute intermission law, and which abrogation took effect October 6, it is now possible to show a multiple-reel subject without destroying any unusual interest it may contain. Then, again, where before exhibitors had to do something for their patrons in the way of entertaining them during these five minutes' lull, they may now simply show pictures continuously. The repeal of the intermission law killed the song and vaudeville stuff."

Mr. Bradley escorted the World man over his place. In the projection room Mutual subjects are shown to exhibitors from as great a distance as 150 miles—on Tuesday mornings releases from Wednesday to Friday inclusive and on Fridays everything from Saturday to Tuesday. The Mutual has an extensive poster department. Mr. Bradley said as to film storage the fire department allowed the company to house but 250 reels at one time. As to trucking facilities, the experience of the Mutual had been such that it had installed its own service—with a remarkable increase in efficiency and promptness of delivery. The force is so divided that the exchange is open twenty-one hours out of the twenty-four, many of the day's bookings being on their way by 5 o'clock in the morning. We also had the pleasure of meeting up with W. H. Patten, manager of the Continental feature department.

Frisco's Screen Club Holds Ball

First Annual Function Big Success—Estimated That Between 8,000 and 9,000 Attended—City and State Officials on Honorary Reception Committee—Photoplayers Present.

THE first annual ball to be given under the auspices of the Screen Club of San Francisco took place on Saturday, November 28, at the Coliseum, 200 Baker street. The Screen Club was organized on October 19 of the present year and the holding of such a successful ball so shortly after its formation is not only an evidence of the desires of its members to make it a success, but of their energy and ability to work in harmony, as well. Sid Grauman, president of the club and one of its organizers, was chairman of the floor committee and also head of the reception committee, and stood at the main entrance during the first part of the evening welcoming the distinguished guests, of which there were a large number. Some idea of the size of the assemblage may be judged from the fact that approximately six thousand tickets were sold at the door, in addition to many that were sold at the box office of the theaters and by various exchanges. It is estimated that the total attendance was between eight and nine thousand persons. The regular reception committee consisted of sixty members of the club, while twenty of the leading city and state officials made up the honorary reception committee.

The grand march was scheduled to start at nine o'clock and it was just a few minutes after this hour when the march, led by Mayor and Mrs. James Rolph, Jr., commenced its circuit of the immense hall. Following the leaders were a galaxy of moving picture stars brought from the studios around the Bay and from the southern part of the State, together with the officials of the club. By this time the crowd had become so dense that it was impossible to keep it from encroaching on the floor, and the grand march became a triumphal procession through a populace anxious to catch a glimpse of their screen favorites in person. When the floor was partly cleared dancing was indulged in, the numbers being interspersed with singing, the enactment of moving picture roles and feature acts from downtown theaters.

An event of the evening was a short address by Mayor James Rolph, Jr., from the balcony of the hall. He pronounced the ball the greatest event of its kind in the history of the city and declared that it eclipsed anything he had ever seen in the line of a hall gathering. He said: "The moving picture business is here to stay, and the immense interest that is taken in screen productions can be judged by this assemblage. Much credit is due the Screen Club for the unqualified success of this event and I wish to thank it for bringing so many player folks here that we might meet them personally." He then read a list of those present and these were brought to the front of the balcony and introduced, amid great enthusiasm. Among those who were presented were: Mr. and Mrs. Roscoe Arbuckle, Mable Normand and Charles Chaplin, of the Keystone; Mr. and Mrs. Victor Potel, Harry H. Todd, Margaret Joslin Todd, Evelyn Selbie, Ernest Van Pelt and wife, of the Western Essanay Company; Max Asher, of the Universal; Lee Willard, True Boardman, Fritz Wintermeier, Lila McClemmon and Miss Ruth Hedington. Ford Sterling planned to be present, but was taken ill with pnenmonia and could not come. Lillian Gish was injured in an automobile accident and was compelled to send regrets. Another star who was prevented from attending through an accident was Margaret Clayton, of the Western Essanay Company, one of the first to respond to the invitation of the Screen Club. She recently suffered a fractured leg in a stage accident.

The attendance at the ball steadily increased until midnight, and tickets were sold as late as two o'clock. The Screen Club expects to net a neat profit from the affair and this money is to be expended in fitting up club rooms in some convenient location in the downtown district. A portion of the funds secured is to be donated to the Associated Charities.

The remarkable success of the monster ball, as it is now known, was due in a large measure to the great publicity that was given it. For weeks before the event it was advertised in all the moving picture houses by means of attractive slides, the fact being emphasized that the leading players were to be present in person. Billboard advertising was used extensively and a real old-time circus stunt was used during the week preceding the event, this being the hanging of colored banners on the span-wires of the downtown trolley system.

A very attractive program of fifty-six pages was distributed, but, owing to the unlooked for attendance, this was given only to the fair sex and was much in demand. This contained pictures of the officers of the Screen Club and of some of the leading actors and actresses in the moving picture profession. It was well filled with announcements from Western producers, exchanges and the local theaters. An interesting feature was the dance program, consisting of fifty-five numbers, each of which bore some distinctive name of general interest. A few of these selected at random were: Keystone Rag, Sterling Two-Step, Chaplin Three-Step, Dorothy Gish Dip, Bronco Billy Gallop, Arbuckle Walk, Slippery Slim Two-Step, General Hesitation, Tivoli Three-Step, Dahnken Glide, Mary Pickford Waltz, Kleine Two-Step, Bunny Hug, Crone Rag, Lesser Two-Step and Kohn Lame Duck.

The following composed the various committees that made the ball such a success: Finance, J. T. Turner, chairman, Sol L. Lesser, Leon Bories; Hall, Frank L. Hudson, chairman, H. J. Gosliner, M. Davis and R. Abraham; Publicity—Joseph Huff, chairman, Wm. McArthur, Tom North and Sol Pincus; Auditing, Ralph Marks, chairman; N. K. Herzog, Chas. Stillwell and F. Dahnken; Printing, Tom North, chairman, E. C. Starko, I. Lichtenstein and F. L. Hudson; Badges, A. Goldberg; Tickets, B. Quive, chairman, A. Markowitz, Wm. Citron and R. L. Marks; Concessions, E. B. Johnson, chairman, Leon Netter, Chas. Stillwell, M. Zar; Program, Chas. Stillwell, chairman, Marion H. Kohn, A. Goldberg, Jack Partington, N. K. Harzog, M. Zar and E. M. Asher; Decorations, R. Abraham, chairman, E. B. Johnson, S. H. Levin and Jack Partington; Players, Leon Bories, chairman, Sol L. Lesser, Tom North, Leon Netter, O. V. Traggardh, Frank L. Hudson, M. L. Markowitz, R. H. Clark, Wm. Citron, George E. Chamberlain, J. R. Crone, R. E. Stebbins, B. S. Cohen, J. W. Allen, Herman Wobber, Nat A. Magner, Frank McCoy, B. Quive, Marion H. Kohn and I. Lichtenstein. The floor committee, Sid Grauman, chairman, was composed of more than twenty of the leading members of the club.

So successful was the ball that next year's event is already being looked forward to and it is hoped that the new municipal auditorium, which has a seating capacity of twelve thousand persons, can be secured.

New York Association Ball

Annual Affair Brings Out Crowd Despite Very Bad Weather. Is Declared By All a Success.

THE ball of the Motion Picture Exhibitors Association of Greater New York at Grand Central Palace on December 7 was attended by a throng estimated at 5,000. Undoubtedly many were deterred from coming by reason of the gale of wind and rain that prevailed during the night and preceding day of the ball. The feature of the occasion was the leading of the grand march by six men and six women photoplayers. There was a good crowd present by 10:30, many of them going to the second floor, where four theaters were in operation. The subjects shown consisted mainly of pre-releases. One exception was the Biograph masterpiece "Judith of Bethulia." On the platform in the center of the hall members of the Edison and Vitagraph companies entertained and the actors and actresses were presented.

The players were present in force. Between the dances the boxes in which there were screen artists were surrounded by large numbers. Every company with players at work in the East was represented. It was considerably after midnight when the grand march was started. Gene Gauntier sent word that she was ill and would be unable to appear in the sextet of screen favorites. The leaders were Francis X. Bushman and Mary Pickford, King Baggot and Mary Fuller, Paul Panzer and Clara Kimball Young, Marc MacDermott and Mary Charleson, James Cruze and Marguerite Snow, and Earle Williams and Anita Stewart. Behind these a long line of photoplayers wound about the great hall. At the conclusion a buffet luncheon was served in the restaurant to the actors and actresses.

Several exhibitors came from out of town. There were among others Marion S. Pearce, of Baltimore, president of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America; Fulton Brylawski, secretary of the Washington City exhibitors; M. A. Neff, former president of the League; George Wiley, of Kansas City, former secretary; William A. Wilson, of Ohio, secretary of the League; M. E. Cory, of San Francisco; Peter Jeupp, of Detroit; John Miller, of Buffalo; W. A. Dongue, secretary of the New York State Exhibitors' Association, of Utica; W. H. Linton, treasurer of the New York State association, accompanied by Mrs. Linton; William Denton, of Hasbrouck Heights, N. J., wth Mrs. Denton, and E. H. Horstmann, president, and Frank J. Howard, of the Massachusetts exhibitors.

The manufacturers and film men were well represented. Among those seen were Daniel Frohman, Carl Laemmle, William Kalem Wright, David Horsley, Leo Stern, George Kann, Joe Brandt, Ad Kessel, "Doc" Willat, Paul Cromelin, accompanied by Mr. Greenberg, of England; Samuel Spedon, Jule Burnstein, Harry Reichenbach, Charles O. Baumann, Mr. Tobias, of the Alliance; Arthur J. Lang, W. E. Shallenberger, A. E. Jones, J. L. Beaudry, John F. Skerritt, Will C. Smith, Lewis J. Selznick, Horace G. Plimpton, Mr. Bruenner, of the Biograph Company; P. A. Powers, C. H. Wilson, of Orange; Adolph Zukor, William L. Sherry, C. M. Du Bosch, of Hugo Reisinger; Tom Moore, of Alco, and Dr. Goodman.

It was after 3 o'clock when the dancing came to a close. The big floor had been filled all evening whenever the band gave the dancers a chance. Everyone seemed to feel the occasion had been a success in very particular.

Fighting Photoplay Pirates

The Selig Polyscope Company Gives Warning That It Will Fight to Protect Its Rights.

THE Selig Polyscope Company issues a warning to all exhibitors and exchanges to the effect that all and any persons who exhibit any photoplay bearing the title of "Mizpah," unless the use of same shall have been granted by the Selig Polyscope Company, will be vigorously prosecuted.

Some time ago the Selig Polyscope Company purchased from Ella Wheeler Wilcox the exclusive motion picture rights to her drama entitled "Mizpah." Another concern has announced a release under the title of "Mizpah." Therefore the Selig Polyscope Company insists that its rights to the name shall not be infringed upon.

Nathan Burkan, attorney for the Selig Polyscope Company in this matter, expresses the legal status of the case.

The question of law involved in this matter is as follows:

One who was the first to use the name "Mizpah" in connection with a play and has made the name known to the public as the title of his play so that the public has come to connect that title with his play, acquires a right to the exclusive use of that name as the title of the play. He can assert his rights by an injunction suit to restrain another from using the same name as the title of a play or of a photoplay.

For the purpose of such an action, it would be immaterial whether any part of the incidents, scenes, characters or ideas of the play have been appropriated. The case would rest upon the question as to whether the use of that name by the infringer is likely to lead the public to believe that the photoplay offered by it is the play to which the title was the first applied. The rights would rest on the principle of unfair competition.

In the case of "Mizpah," there is no question that the owner of the play "Mizpah" could stop any concern from using the name as the title of a photoplay.

Under certain circumstances it has also been held that one who has acquired the exclusive motion picture rights in a play can protect the name against one who uses it for another photoplay.

In view of the frequent duplicating of titles, or the releasing of titles almost similar, this step by the Selig Polyscope Company is very important and means a great deal to the manufacturer. Mr. Selig states that he will protect his rights vigorously without fear or favor against all who shall infringe upon his rights to any titles.

ONE DIRECTOR'S HARD WORK.

The infinite care that Director Charles J. Brabin, Edison, gave to the production of "The Birth of Our Saviour," released December 19, is only indirectly reflected in that film by the artlessness of art which the characters in this great story virtually live their simple, noble parts in this greatest of dramas. To produce an effect which passes the eyes in twelve seconds Director Brabin worked for twelve hours straight before it satisfied him as being worthy of being filmed. To get the night effect in the pictures the players had to work all night or until dawn changed the lighting. Director Brabin believes it to be the best film he ever produced.

EDITH TALIAFERRC IN "YOUNG ROMANCE."

For Miss Taliaferro's photo-drama debut Mr. Lasky has selected a play entitled "Youno Romance," which is by William C. DeMille. The production will be directed by Cecil B. DeMille, brother of the author. The story of "Young Romance" concerns the experiences of a young girl clerk in a department store who, in a fit of June madness, determines to pretend that she is a rich lady of fashion during a brief vacation of one week. In this manner Nellie Nolan transforms herself into Miss Ethel Van Dusen and proceeds to Ocean Beach, Me., there to live a brief life as a society butterfly. One of the young men in the store is seized with substantially the same plan and repairs to the same summer resort. The experiences of these two young imposters culminate in their determination to marry.

CHICAGO LETTER

BY JAS. S. McQUADE

Essanay Cameramen Blocked in Central Africa by War.

EARLY during the present year, in February, as was duly chronicled in these columns at the time, C. A. Luperti and D. T. Hargan, expert camera men, set out for central Africa in the interests of the Essanay Film Manufacturing Company. They carried with them cinematographic supplies and instruments which, together with other necessary impedimenta, were sufficient to load a small coasting schooner. The main object of the expedition was to secure moving pictures of the fauna of African jungles and plains that would put in the shade all other attempts in that direction.

The intrepid explorers are back again in the city. They hvae returned after a most trying experience, but minus 20,000 feet of valuable negatives, and are now resting up after undergoing the grilling hardships of a forced march of over 700 miles through one of the worst tracts of central Africa. The march with its consequent deprivations, strange to say, had its origin in the outbreak of the great European war.

When the expedition left the United States in February, the party included, in addition to the cameramen, James Sutherland, a well-known English elephant hunter; Capt. G. H. Anderson, of the 18th British Hussars; T. P. Lindsey, of Boston, son-in-law of Thomas Nelson Page, American Ambassador to Italy, and Elton Clark, another wealthy Bostonian with an inclination for travel and adventure. Captain Anderson and Mr. Sutherland had an interest in the moving picture expedition, which, altogether, represented an investment of about $30,000.

The party landed at Lindi, in German East Africa, some distance south of Zanzibar. Thence it advanced into the elephant country with 100 native bearers, and, on May 24, established a permanent camp on the Luwago River, in the Mohengi district.

The story, as it concludes, is best told in the words of Cameraman Hargan:

"On August 24, runners arrived from the German colonial government with a note commanding us to leave the country at once, and on our way out to report at a German fort, which was designated. We knew that Captain Anderson would be seized as a prisoner and that Sutherland also would be grabbed, so we decided to make common fortune together and go through Portuguese territory to Fort Johnson, a British post at the southern end of Lake Nyassa, and thence to the coast.

"We delayed answering the German message as long as we could, in order to hold up the Germans' native couriers until night, figuring that then there would be another delay, owing to their waiting until the next morning to start. Luperti wrote a note to the German authorities stating that it would take two days for us to get our stuff together and get started. We figured that altogether we would have a start of four or five days before pursuit could be instituted.

"Sixteen of our bearers deserted, leaving thirty blacks with six white men. We then left our films in tin trunks in the permanent camp.

"We crossed the Rovuma River into Portuguese territory on September 3. There we found the natives hostile, and had to take turns standing guard at night with our revolvers. To make matters worse, our three cameras were mistaken for machine guns and word went ahead to Fort Johnson that a German attacking force was on the way.

"A scout from Fort Johnson came out disguised as a prospector and recognized Sutherland. Then we learned that two machine guns would have swept us had we arrived at Fort Johnson in the night.

"Captain Anderson left us at Madeira to enter France and join his regiment at the front. There's a possibility that we'll get the 20,000 feet of film we left in German East Africa, but it's a long gamble."

Drastic Railroad Order Against Films.

Owing to the explosion of several films on a passenger coach on a train bound out of Chicago a few weeks ago, which resulted in the serious injury of over twenty passengers and the death of one of them (the Mayor of Berwyn, a small outlying town), drastic orders have been issued by all railroads operating out of Chicago.

These orders prohibit the transportation in baggage cars or the carrying in any passenger car of any dangerous article or anything that is liable to cause an explosion or that is inflammable in its nature. None of the following articles will be accepted as baggage in any form, nor will passengers be permitted to go on trains with the same: Dynamite, gunpowder, fireworks, loaded firearms, moving picture films, inflammable liquids, compressed gas, gasoline and matches.

As soon as the order was issued by the railroads on Friday, December 4, representatives of the big moving picture manufacturers called at the offices of several of the railroads and protested vigorously on the grounds that under the railroad ruling the only way films could be transported would be in express cars, and that the rates by express being so high, the film companies would be put to great expense.

Officers of the railroads said that there was no appeal from the order; that the recent explosion in a Burlington smoking car, said to be due to overheated films, with its resultant fatalities, was sufficient answer to the film concerns. The transportation heads said that they believed the public demanded such an order and that everything possible would be done to enforce it to the letter.

Trainmen will be instructed to scrutinize hand baggage and all suspicious appearing bundles, and use every possible effort to detect the dangerous articles and prohibit their being taken on the trains.

Who Is Sue?

The Chicago "Herald Movies" force has set a fast pace in order to discover, in the most thorough manner, who is Chicago's prettiest and most popular girl. The staff has already completed plans for the camera work that will be necessary, after the forty contestants in the voting contest have been selected by the board of judges.

The girls chosen for the final contest will be photographed for the "Herald Movies," and the pictures will be displayed to moving picture patrons (who will select "Sue"), in the regular weekly film issued by the Herald.

Photographs of girls who desire to be "Sue" have been pouring into the Herald office by every mail and have kept the photoplay editor busy indexing and getting them ready for the board of judges which will select the forty prettiest for the final contest.

All pictures of candidates must be in the Herald office by noon, December 11, in order to be eligible for the contest, which will start on the following Sunday, December 13. Many of the photographs received will be reproduced in issues of the Sunday Herald, while the forty selected will be reproduced on the Sunday on which the voting contest starts.

Glowing Praise for George Kleine's "Julius Caesar."

Into George Kleine's Chicago office letters of congratulation and praise are being received by every mail from all parts of the country, regarding the artistic merits and great success of "Julius Caesar."

In San Francisco the great film subject was the object of unusual attention among people of culture and education. Professor William Dallam Armes, of the Leland Stanford University, arranged for an exhibition of the films in the ballroom of the St. Francis Hotel. Over 700 of the smart and professional set of the city attended. The Board of Education and teachers of San Francisco, Oakland, Berkeley and adjoining cities, all attended presentations of the films.

Unusual praise comes from Columbus, O., where "Julius Caesar" had a two weeks' run in the Great Southern Theater. Professors and students from the Ohio State University, school teachers and scholars of Columbus, and thousands of others attended. Many came back a second time to see the pictures.

One professor of the Ohio State University stated at the box office that "the pictured life of 'Julius Caesar' is as historically accurate a reproduction of the life of ancient times as could be made."

The photography also came in for great praise. An art critic among one of the audiences said: "The pictures are so clear they seem to be full of the genuine sunlight of Italy." Another said: "The scenes showing Roman interiors and the Roman forum are like the classic paintings of Alma Tadema." Still another critic said: "No such great classic drama as this has been produced in motion pictures, I believe, and I say this after having seen them all, including 'Quo Vadis,' 'Antony and Cleopatra' and 'Cabiria.'"

A recent cablegram from Rome conveys the information that the Italian Government is laying a heavy tax on moving pictures in order to raise the $200,000,000 which Italy is now expending on military and naval preparations. According to the cable, the new law is already in effect and places a tax of from 1 to 4 cents, according to the price of admission, on every ticket sold to a moving picture show. It is estimated that the tax will bring $1,000,000.

Chief John C. McDonnell, of the fire prevention bureau in this city, recently sent in an ordinance through the law department requiring all theaters to employ men ushers. "I have a great admiration for moving pictures," says Mrs. Harrison. "I feel that the man who can make you actually see his plot in the suroundings which his own mind has pictured, the man who can tell a story to your eyes, brings it far closer to your heart than the novelist can. The Garden Theater, 3310 North Marshfield Avenue, this city, was partly destroyed by fire Monday morning, December 7. The damage is estimated as being between $12,000 and $15,000. The origin of the fire lead to an investigation by Fire Attorney Joseph J. Murray and Chief John C. McDonnell, of the Fire Prevention Bureau and the City Electrical Department. The damage was mainly confined to the stage and that part of the building in the rear of the proscenium arch, as the heavy steel curtain prevented the flames from communicating to the front of the building. R. C. Plough, of the Anti-Trust Branch of Universal, is the lessor.

CHANGE OF DATE OF EDISON RELEASE.

The Edison Company have found it necessary to substitute for "Mr. Daly's Wedding Day," announced for release December 28, a comedy drama, "The Calico Cat," wherein the droll comedian Mr. William Wadsworth is at his best as the eccentric old man whose hatred of cats involved him in a criminal case. Unable to resist a shot at a calico cat, he apparently shoots an Italian stealing chickens. The lawyer fastens the charge on a young boy. The amusing situation is complicated by the old man being drawn as one of the jurors whose conscience continually bothers him, finally forcing him to confess—to find that the injury was trumped up, the exposure coming by a woman's detective work. The one-reel photoplay is an adaptation of the story by Mr. Charles M. Thompson.

Doings at Los Angeles

DIRECTOR J. P. McGOWAN, the intrepid director of Kalem's "Hazards of Helen" series, is seriously injured, and is in a hospital suffering from broken bones and shock sustained when he fell thirty-five feet from a telephone pole to the ground while doing one of the late installments of the series. The producer of railroad stories will not be able to work for about six months. McGowan was crossing a suspended wire, hand over hand, and, owing to the slack in the cable, he could not complete the trip and had to drop. In his absence Paul Hurst will take over the company.

Another unfortunate photoplayer was severely injured this week in an automobile accident. Dorothy Gish is the fair player who was nearly killed in the crash of automobiles. She suffered severe bruises and cuts and will be unable to work for over a month. The production of "The Sisters" had to be stopped and her sister, who was featured with Dorothy, is taking care of her. The brave little actress did not mind the doctor's taking the many stitches, but only requested that "mama must not know this, she must not —wait and let me tell her after I am put to bed, tell her I'm all right."

Ruth Roland, for so long a charming comedian with Kalem, and who was recently changed over to the dramatic company, has closed with the Horkheimer brothers and will hereafter be seen in Balboa films. She goes to the beach studio on the 28th of this month. Her place will be taken by Cleo Ridgley, who came across the continent on horseback some time ago. She will be under the direction of James Horne, who recently took George Melford's place when he left for the Lasky firm. Horne will put on a big series. A. C. Gage has been made business manager at his Kalem branch.

Charles Chaplin is considering big and handsome offers by several managers and his closing with the Keystone makes him a much wanted comedian. He has not announced any connection, but when he does it is sure to be a big one. Mack Sennet is as busy as ever with his big company.

About the happiest man in Los Angeles is J. Farrel Macdonald who is playing, with Mrs. Carter at the Tiffany studio. The reason is that a smiling bundle of childish sweetness was presented to him last week by Mrs. Macdonald. The little leading lady weighed eight and three-quarter pounds and is a little package of sunshine, so says the proud daddy. She has already been named after her mama, Edith Bostwick Macdonald. The father is taking moving pictures of the little one, several feet each day for the first week, a like amount once a week for a month, and every month for a year will the camera be used to register the baby's growth. Then each year she will be photographed, and the film will be kept for her to see when she grows up.

Richard Stanton, director-actor, arrived home at Inceville this week from a thrilling voyage to San Francisco and San Diego. At the former place he alighted from the train and heard newsboys yelling extras about the wreck of the S. S. Hanalei, which had gone ashore on the reets above that city. Stanton rented a big automobile and proceeded with his cameraman, Joe Myers, to the scene, arriving there at four in the morning. They were unable to get any shipwreck scenes, but were in time to help in the rescue of the bodies as they washed ashore. The fog was so thick that photography was out of the question. They carried back to the city three of the poor unfortunates who had been drowned.

Ford Sterling, our famous comedian of the little, short beard, is very seriously ill at his home, suffering from a severe attack of typhoid fever and pneumonia. The attending doctor says that his condition is so precarious that immediate recovery is doubtful. Ford contracted a severe cold on his way home from the east, which later went to pneumonia, when he became overheated one day last week while working at the studio.

Called up Mary H. O'Connor and the wires got tangled and she was at Santa Barbara, the long distance operator connecting us without telling where she was. The photoplaywright said that she had been called north to write a feature for Margarita Fischer. Promised a newsy letter immediately. Said that the American studio was busy except for the rain.

The Universal publicity office has turned into a paper bakery. What is a paper bakery? Ask the editor. We received the Universal weekly news sheet this day and it had a hole in the middle where some lengthy item had been "killed" by the scissors. Other items on the page were good, but wonder what the omitted one was?

W. E. Keefe of the publicity office of the Mutual has been in San Francisco for a week attending to company business. The studio was as busy as usual except for a few members of the company who are on the sick list.

December, with its varying weather, is here and already two rains have placed cameras in the vaults, except where the producers use electric lights. The beauty of California rains is that they come in the night and next day the sun comes out and the air is better than ever. A few cloudy days have put the ban on pictures, but all in all the weather is fair.

If anyone doubts the efficiency of Inceville, here is an incident that will put the doubts on the shelf. T. H. Ince believes in detail, for the other day I visited the canyon studio and was actually surprised to see Clara William drinking, or at least she looked to be drinking, a glass of champagne in a big scene for a current feature picture Two quarts of glistening, bubbling, fizzing wine were opened for a close-up scene in this great production, and the principals were seen imbibing. At another set just across the stage Bessie Barriscale and her company were partaking of real Martini cocktails, and no burnt sugar was shaken up to look like the icy drink that was served up here. On the back stage a Dutch picture was in progress and Rhea Mitchell and her company were saying "prosit" and doffing huge steins of lager, which flowed freely from a real keg.

Director R. S. Sturgeon, of the Vitagraph, with his company of players who have been isolated in Bear Valley for nearly a month, are to return soon for the snow has finally come and they are taking the winter scenes for a big picture. But just now a long distance message turns the tables for the snow did not continue and the players had to stop taking pictures. It was just a forerunner of the big storm. Sturgeon says they are just loafing and waiting for the big white clouds to gather, in the meantime duck shooting, and various amusements keep the movie people busy. The hotel up in the hills is being kept open especially for the players, as it usually closes ere the snow falls.

Out at Universal City big things are going on. Francis Ford and his players have removed to the new town and other companies are preparing to emigrate. The U. C. Mounted Police force is complete with half a dozen expert riders, four of which are on duty daytime and the other two care for the big town at night. Jerry Barnes, head trainer at the ranch was bitten by a wolf-dog last week, the animal taking out a piece of Jerry's leg while he was training it to jump through a lighted hoop.

Kathlyn Williams has started a fad here. To become an expert swordswoman she had to practice. This was for "Peggy"—a Selig picture being put on—and so well did she like fencing that she has taken it up as a steady diversion. Fashionable maids and matrons are now following suit at a big hotel and are taking lessons. Kathlyn said, "It's the best fun I ever had, besides it's good exercise."

Manager Bernstein, of the Universal, is proud of a fine Kentucky saddle horse which Mr. Laemmle presented to him before departing for the east. The Universal automobile drivers also gave him a silver loving cup.

The list of charming Southern California motor maids has been added to materially by the buying of some new cars. Clara Williams, of Inceville, has exchanged her Overland for a new Fair model roadster, the first in this city. Myrtle Stedman, of Bosworth, has put in a new modeled tourer, and Louise Glaum, also of Inceville, has invested in a pretty racy roadster.

Do you remember John L. Sullivan, the one-time great pugilist? Well, he has arrived here and the company has been formed bearing his name, with Harry Revere, J. L. Sullivan, D. P. Sullivan, L. M. Sullivan, P. L. Clark, and E. S. Cummings as the incorporators. The company will make but one feature, a multiple reeler, showing the life of the former fighter. Many local pugs will be seen on the screen in battles, the picture to show the art of self-protection without any arms—that is, weapons. A studio is being especially fitted for this picture.

Charles Clary has succeeded in giving to the screen a most perfect representation as Father Kelly in "The Rosary" being put out by the Selig company. He was also very good as Mohammed in "The Carpet of Bagdad." Mr. Clary can portray characters as well as play straight heavies. The current picture is nearing completion, an Irish village having been constructed and used at the beach for the big scenes.

David Warfield visited the Lasky studio this week, leaving his work at the Mason Opera House to see how pictures are made. When asked why he did not want to enter the screen business he said that he liked to use his voice, and he knew the talk would not register. He watched the finishing touches being put to three of the late productions at this busy plant. It is expected that the big new glass stage will be ready by the first of the year.

CLARKE IRVINE.

Great Edison Plant Burned

Fire Wrecks Ten Big Factory Buildings at East Orange, N. J.—Origin Not in Film Factory.

A DEVASTATING conflagration which had its origin in the varnishing department of the phonograph building, swept the great plant of the Thomas A. Edison, Inc., at East Orange, N. J., and practically destroyed ten big concrete buildings occupying the Edison tract. The fire started about 5.30 o'clock Wednesday evening, December 9, just before the day's work was concluded. Some 7,000 men and women employed in the several buildings are believed to have escaped without injury, though the fire spread with great rapidity from building to building. The fire departments of the several villages of Orange were unable to cope with the flames and were further hampered by inadequate water supply. The only buildings that escaped were the experimental laboratory and storage battery buildings. The loss is estimated at $7,000,000 on a plant covered by but $2,000,000 of insurance.

Mr. Edison was present and calmly witnessed the destruction of his magnificent property. He cheerfully told his people that the work of reconstruction would be commenced as soon as the ruins cooled sufficiently to commence the work of clearing away the wreck.

Will Not Affect Edison Releases.

The trade will be interested and relieved to know that the fire, as bad as it was, will not affect the continuity of Edison releases. Every picture scheduled will go out on the advertised date, and there will be no interruption in the production and manufacture of pictures planned. This fortunate condition is due to the fact that all negatives were taken from the motion picture building before the fire reached that part of the plant. Such trucks as were available were quickly brought into use, men were stationed to watch the progress of the flames and a score more were kept busy carrying out the stock as long as they could do so with safety. In this way many thousands of feet of most valuable negatives were removed to a place of safety. Had more trucking facilities been obtainable the positive and raw stock might also have been saved.

Not a "Film Fire."

Here, we have to correct a gross error in the stories of the fire published in the New York newspapers. In bold type the fire was charged up to the motion picture films in their columns and heralded over the country as another "film fire."

The facts are that the fire started in the varnishing department of the phonograph building at 5.30 o'clock, and the flames did not reach the motion picture plant till 9.30 o'clock—four hours later. This building was the last of all the structures comprising the plant to catch fire.

By another fortunate circumstance the Edison Company had an emergency motion picture equipment in the phonograph record building, a wooden structure across the street adjoining the storage battery building, neither of which was burned. This plant will be put into working order as quickly as possible and is of sufficient capacity to handle all orders. In the meantime immediate needs of the company will be cared for in the plants of some of the other makers, who hastened to place their facilities at the disposal of the Edison people.

WILLIAM FOX OFFICES ISSUE HELPS TO THE EXHIBITOR.

With each of its new leading features, The Box Office Attractions Company, of which William Fox is president, is issuing a large, attractive herald providing crisp stories with points about the picture and the players who have good parts in it. These—the herald is apt to contain a dozen of them—are for use in local newspapers and have the quality of interest that will make local editors glad to get them. This herald should be, as far as exhibitors are concerned, a very welcome first aid to the publicity man.

AUSTRALIA PUTS WAR TAX ON PICTURES.

Word has been received in New York to the effect that the Colonial parliament has just passed an act levying a war tax on motion pictures to the amount of four cents on every foot of positive film brought into that country. The tax is viewed as prohibitive by the trade, and it is believed the effect will be to close many picture theaters during the summer season which is about to open there. This will seriously affect American makers who have established a considerable market in Australia.

"The School for Scandal"

Point and Spice of Sheridan's Famous Comedy Still Plain in Kalem Four-Reel Picture—A High-Class Offering.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

IT MAY not be so flourishing as in the days when that wonderful wag, Dick Sheridan, wrote his satirical comedy; but the real and actual school for scandal is still open. As long as tongues tattle, Sheridan's "School for Scandal" is not likely to die. The Kalem Company has picturized it in four reels and has achieved an astonishing success. The screen version has been prepared by Phil Lang, who has introduced a most pleasing and successful novelty. The pleasing effect that the offering makes does not wholly depend on this, but it surely is a tremendous addition to it.

This novelty was absolutely impossible in the stage version and is much more vivid than what the spoken play gave in its place. Of course, as Mr. Lang knows, a picture is usually made of the action between the stage acts, the offstage things explained in the dialogue; but here he has found an unique chance and has made a good thing of it. In the talk in Lady Sneerwell's parlor, the scandal college, certain things are told. In the picture we first see just what happened and then see what is told. This rises to a height when Sir Peter Teazle hears the tale of what happened when his wife was behind the curtain in the house of Joseph Surface. He says, "Oh, no, you have got it all wrong," and tells a whopper even worse. We have seen what really took place, of course, and Sir Peter's wild story (vividly pictured) takes the breath away from Lady Sneerwell, and, we might add, from us. It is, indeed, remarkable how much of the humor and the cutting point of the comedy has been kept in the picture. The story is clearly told, too. The rich brocade costumes, the Georgian furniture, the acting and general staging are all good. It makes an astonishingly entertaining offering.

Scene from "School for Scandal" (Kalem).

Lady Teazle is played by Alice Joyce and she is at her prettiest and makes a vivacious and very acceptable Lady Teazle. James B. Ross is just as pleasing as Sir Peter—there's fun in the old man. Guy Coombs is a justly balanced gallant as Charles Surface; there is the right refinement and atmosphere in his work. In fact, in this polite comedy, refinement even in the worst characters is absolutely necessary and in this respect as in most others the director, Keanan Buel, is all that could be wanted. Lady Sneerwell is played by Mary Ross; Joseph Surface by Jere Austin; Snake by Joseph Cordova; Sir Oliver Surface by James Cooper; Moses by Henry Grant; Maria, the heiress, very pleasingly by Irene Boyle; Mrs. Candour by Agusta Burgermeister, and Crabtree by Richard Purdon.

PROGRESSIVE FILM EXCHANGE.

The Peoria Film Exchange of Peoria, Ill., seems to be one of the live distributing agencies of this country. Besides conducting a live rental business it makes a specialty of accessories, carrying a complete line of machines and supplies for motion picture theatres. This exchange reports a good business in Motiographs and has placed many orders for the latest model motor-drive machines made by the Enterprise Optical Manufacturing Company.

Robert Broderick

ROBERT BRODERICK, leading man of the Dyreda Art Film Corporation, who are using the old Reliance studios at Yonkers, N. Y., has an international reputation as an actor, having played with such stars as Francis Wilson, Virginia Harned, Thomas Jefferson, and many others. Mr. Broderick has been for several years one of the bright stars of the operatic stage and in regard to the various make-ups of different characters, he is said to have no equal.

Robert Broderick.

His first advent into the picture game was with the Kinemacolor Company on the coast, where he wrote and played the lead in the old fable, "Jack the Giant Killer." His portrayal of that difficult character was so excellent that he was made an offer by the Western Kalem Company which he accepted and with whom he remained for some time. He then came east and joined the eastern branch of that company, and from there to the Famous Players Company. His work with that company attracted considerable favorable comment, and when his director, J. Searle Dawley left the Famous Players Company to form his own company, the Dyreda Art Film Company, he took Mr. Broderick with him as his leading man.

The Dyreda Company, up to the present time, have made two big feature pictures in which Mr. Broderick has played the lead, and these pictures are being released through the World Film Corporation. The first picture, a four-reel subject, "One of Millions," has already been released, and many expressions of approval have been made on the excellent work of Mr. Broderick, both by the public and the press. The other feature, "In the Name of the Prince of Peace," in four reels, will be released in December.

COMING ALCO RELEASES.

The Alco Film Corporation, under the guidance of its new directorate, with President Walter Hoff Seeley at the helm, announces a long list of high-class releases, beginning with the Popular Plays and Players' production of "The Tigress," which with Madame Olga Petrova, was shown Monday, December 7. Through the producing companies affiliated with the Alco the following high-class plays and acknowledged stars will be introduced to the screen:

December 21—Max Sennett's production of the exhilarating comedy, "Tillie's Punctured Romance," in which Marie Dressler, Charles Chaplin and Mabel Normand are featured.

December 28—"Springtime," from the plays by Booth Tarkington, with the popular legitimate star, Florence Nash, in the leading role; Life Photo Film Corporation, producers.

January 4—Jane Cowl, one of the stage's most attractive stars, in the All-Star Feature Corporation's production of "The Garden of Lies."

Successful plays, with real stars, will feature the Alco program in the future. Another prominent producing concern will announce affiliation with Alco shortly, after which the entire program, from the first quarter ending March 1, will be announced.

Arthur S. Kane, assistant general manager of the World Film Corporation, is away on a two weeks' business trip for his company. His itinerary will bring him to Philadelphia, Washington, Atlanta, New Orleans and Dallas. From there he is not certain which way he will travel, but he will make a careful study of conditions in every one of the cities mentioned, giving special attention to conditions in the feature field.

Among the Picture Theaters

WASHINGTON'S SUCCESSFUL BUSINESS WOMEN.

Mrs. Brame and Miss Cohen, Sisters, Are Picture Pioneers of the Fair Sex—Four Profit-Earning Theaters to Their Credit.

WHEN we think of the word "capitalist," we seldom apply that word to a woman. Glance through the daily papers and see the word "syndicate." Would you apply that term to a group of women? There are such things as these, but poor, retiring woman seldom creeps into the limelight like the sterner sex, although often as equally deserving of splashes of printers' ink. Now, in Washington, as befits the Nation's Capital, we have several women who have been able to carve a few nicks in the rungs of the ladder leading to success. The law, medicine, and the other professions, are well represented by the ladies. However, we seldom link a woman's name with commerce, except when applied to millinery, dressmaking, or other feminine art, but no history of Washington's motion picture industry is complete without reference being made to Mrs. Cora C. Brame and Miss Sadie P. Cohen.

Mrs. Cora C. Brame.

These two ladies, sisters, are pioneers in the motion picture game, for they started in almost at its inception, opening at the Victoria theater, at 505 Seventh street, Southwest. In those days, motion pictures had not gained the popularity they have since attained and the staking of their all in the venture demanded hustle and a close attention to the details of the business that would cause even a man to hesitate. In them the business instinct was merely dormant for they soon brought their business up to a most satisfactory point.

The seating capacity of the house is but three hundred, and with the exception of Wednesdays and Sundays, when feature shows are given and a charge of ten cents made, the price of admission is but five cents. In a measure they outgrew the Southwest and began searching about for a widened field for their activities, with the result that three years later they opened the Carolina theater, at Eleventh street and North Carolina avenue, in the soutseast section of the city.

Miss Sadie P. Cohen.

The Carolina has about the same seating capacity as the Victoria, but the foyer is capable of accommodating two hundred more persons. The same methods of management of this house are followed as at the Victoria and here again success has been attained.

"Always on the job," that's the reason why—"Never put off until tomorrow what should be done today, or leave unto others that which you should do yourself," are the reasons given by the ladies. In following many of the old maxims they have gained much as may be seen when it is said that within the past year they have been able to take over two more theaters in the other sections of the city.

Their next move was the taking over of the Regent theater at Eighteenth and California streets, in one of the most fashionable sections of the fashionable northwest. At this exclusive house they show nothing but features and their program here includes the best obtainable photoplays from all of the large companies. The house ranks among the best in the city and it is under the direct supervision of Mrs. Brame, for it is here that she makes her headquarters, although keeping a watchful care over the Carolina, which she calls her pet, and which is a good money-maker. The Regent has a seating capacity of three hundred and sixty and is well equipped and furnished. It was but very recently that they installed two new Simplex motor-driven projecting machines for they believe in keeping their projection up to a fine standard. Matinees at this theater on Fridays, Saturdays and Sundays, have proven very satisfactory.

Their last venture is the Orpheum theater, located in Stanton Park, one of the handsomest spots in Northeast Washington, where blooming plants, trees and shrubs form a pretty setting for an attractive house. This house also has a seating capacity of about three hundred. It is equipped with a gold fibre screen and two Powers 6-A projecting machines. At this theater Miss Cohen maintains her headquarters for she looks after this house and also the Victoria.

Courtesy and proper projection are the main points to which attention is paid. The ladies themselves are courtesy personified and they demand the same measure from all of their employees and at all times. The projection at all of the houses is of the best for they well realize that patrons object to the results usually obtained from a poor screen, an inexperienced operator and machines more fit for the scrap heap than use in a theater. They look after the many little details—keep the houses well cleaned and ventilated, and comfortable.

Regent Theater, Washington, D. C.

Another element of their success has been the limiting of the number of reels to be shown for a given sum of money; three reels for five cents and five or six for ten cents will not keep the house filled up to the exclusion of other patrons and will net a legitimate profit. They also believe that the better known features should bring even more than ten cents, and that the time is not far distant when fifteen and twenty-five cents will be demanded and gladly paid by patrons when they are shown. They predict big things for big features. To the Moving Picture World correspondent, Mrs. Brame stated that if she but had the necessary seating capacity at the Regent she would not for a moment hesitate in putting on the photoplays which necessitate higher admissions.

A great deal more could be said about the business acumen displayed by Mrs. Brame and Miss Cohen, but their success has been built upon just such things as many others have been prone to overlook. The last has not been heard of them by any means and perhaps it might be safe to predict that the downtown district may yet be invaded by them, at that time with a theater having a large seating capacity. They are playing the game as it should be played—it's a gamble at the best—but the male exhibitors of the city must, and do doff their hats to Washington's two successful businesses women, Mrs. Cora Cohen Brame and Miss Sadie P. Cohen, and the best wishes of all belong to them.

LIBERTY THEATER, DETROIT, MICH.

Kunsky, a Prominent Exhibitor, Remodels Church Into Up-to-Date Picture Theater—Seats Over 700.

CHANGING a church building into a theater building, and entirely losing the "churchie" feeling and instilling a distinct theatrical effect into the same structure, is not often done, but from the illustration shown, of the Liberty theater, Detroit, Mich., one can see how completely this change has been brought about, without expending an undue amount of money. The Liberty is owned and operated by John H. Kunsky, of Detroit, and is one of the most successful theaters devoted exclusively to moving pictures in that city. Although this theater is located on a side street, off from the main travel, it is decidedly popular, and the people seem to like its clean defined lines and the cosy atmosphere that prevails throughout.

Liberty Theater, Detroit, Mich.

In order to entirely lose the church effect on the exterior, the tower, or steeple, was completely removed, the old windows bricked up and the entire exterior of the building covered with cement plaster. At the point where the entrance was to be located a special design was used and a very pleasing effect obtained with the use of green tile, marble and electric lights. The marquise is built of iron and glass, extends to the curb and instead of the usual small center box office, a large roomy one has been provided at the side. One will notice when looking at the illustration that ample space has been provided for posters of all sizes, and this space is so arranged that plenty of advertising can be obtained without unduly blocking up the entrances and covering the fronts of the theater with frames.

The theater has a seating capacity of over 700 and the interior is very high and spacious, as it was found to be more economical to retain the old church ceiling height than to lower it by putting in a false ceiling. This arrangement makes the theater ideal in summer. A rather elaborate ventilating system has also been installed, which provides plenty of fresh air and also exhausts the foul air, making a complete change of air every few minutes.

There is a large pipe organ installed at the rear of the theater, over the operating room, with a keyboard controlling it in the orchestra pit. The effects are everything that can be desired and very satisfactory, in fact the organ and orchestra play together just as well as if the organ were in the pit.

The interior effects lean a little to the garden order, that is, lattice work, trellis work and artificial flowers are the principal form of decorations. There is always a cool and refreshing aspect in a theater decorated in this way and with the aid of small incandescent lights studded in flowers the effect is beautiful.

Rich green carpet covers the foyer and aisles, and the aisles are lighted by special fixtures which are attached to the sides of the end chairs. This aisle illumination prevents stumbling and in no way does it effect the pictures.

The operating room is located directly over the lobby and is of large dimensions. It is well ventlated. The manager's office is so located that an excellent view of the interior and screen can be had from this point. He is also in direct communication with the operating booth which is located right next to his office.

The theater has a stage fourteen feet in depth and is fully equipped in every particular, including a large stage switch board, which controls all the lights both in the auditorium and on the stage. The theater is so wired that the entire auditorium can also be controlled from the operating room, thus doing away with all employees on the stage when pictures only are being shown.

Suitable retiring rooms are provided for women, and sanitary drinking fountains are installed in the lobby. The building was remodelled and opened in three months from the date that the contractors began work, and from the beginning enjoyed success. A vacuum cleaning plant is one more detail that has been added to make this theater one of the most complete of its kind. The architect was C. Howard Crane, of Detroit.

GEM THEATER, CHARLES CITY, IA.

The accompanying photograph is an interior view of the Gem theater, Charles City, Iowa. It is owned and managed by B. E. Wright. The auditorium is big enough to seat 525 persons comfortably, the dimensions being 44x80 feet. The size of the stage is 20x34 feet, and the proscenium arch is 14x22 feet. The structure is 90 feet deep by 66 feet wide. Mr. Wright is particularly proud of the house as he not only designed it but attended to the construction work as well, he being a contractor.

ALLIANCE INVADES CANADA.

Andrew J. Cobe, general manager of the Alliance Films Corporation, has just returned from Montreal, where he has made arrangements with the Noted Players Feature Film Co. to handle all Alliance releases in the Dominion. J. D. Goldie, the head of the Noted Players, will shortly have in addition to the Montreal exchange, fully equipped offices in Toronto and Winnipeg. These are to be followed by other branches in the larger Canadian centers. The projected offices will be located in St. Johns, Calgary and Regina. The St. Johns office will handle the Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward's Island territory. Winnipeg will take care of the Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia.

SCHNEIDER TO OPEN THEATER.

Another picture theater is soon to be added to the list on Hennepin avenue, Minneapolis, Minn. Benjamin Schneider is remodeling the premises at 602-604 Hennepin avenue to be used as a moving picture theater, which will have a capacity of 350.

THEATER CHANGES HANDS.

The Empress theater, at Prince Albert, Saskatchewan, Canada, has changed hands, Guy F. Mack having sold the place to James McKay. According to the new management the house will be devoted to the exploitation of features. A road show will be booked occasionally.

BELLEVUE'S NEW PICTURE HOUSE.

A SPLENDID moving picture theater was added to the list of those being operated in Bellevue, Ohio, when Willis Da Walt opened October 1 his new Lion Theater. The accompanying photograph will convey to the readers the beauty and symmetry of its frontal architectural decorations. The name of the house has been carefully worked into the tile flooring of the lobby right in front of the ticket office. It is one of the best moving picture theaters in the eastern part of the state. The structure was erected as nearly as possible of fireproof material, brick, steel and concrete being used.

The building is 75 feet deep by 43 feet wide, and the auditorium can seat 299. The color scheme of the interior is gray and gold. There are large panels in light gray which are bordered with an ornamental plaster moulding, and these add to the effectiveness of the interior embellishments. The decorative designs both inside and out, were furnished by the

The Lion Theater, Bellevue, Ohio.

Chicago Decorators' Supply Company, whose main office is in Chicago. The indirect lighting system is used. The operating room is made of steel and there are two Simplex motor-driven machines installed.

One of the predominating features in the management of the Lion Theater is that there are no posters of any description detracting from the handsome appearance of the entrance. While we have not been told how the manager calls to the attention of the public the names and classifications of the subjects for a show, we should say that he either has them announced in advertisements in the daily papers, by programs, or by neatly printed placards in attractive frames on each side of the lobby, or by all three methods. The music is furnished by a Wurlitzer Unit Orchestrion. Willis Da Walt has had seven years' experience in the show business and has managed several big theaters. The Lion plays only features of the better kind.

POCAHONTAS, IA., GETS NEW HOUSE.

The Airdome at Pocahontas, Ia., which was operated by O'Donnell & Thornton, was closed about seven weeks ago. These men opened on November 21 their new picture house named The Princess, which has a seating capacity of 250. Pocahontas has a population of 1,500, and the new theater has been doing a good business since it was opened. Pictures are projected by a Power's 6a machine upon a mirror screen. The house will play big features as well as serials, the managers say.

GENTER HAS NEW CURTAIN COATING.

The J. H. Genter Co., Inc., Newburg, N. Y., makers of the celebrated Mirroroide screen, have just placed on the market a new screen and curtain coating, known as Master White. This coating is a very fine white glass preparation, guaranteed not to contain lime, glue, or whitening, and to be fire and water proof. It is very easily applied and comes ready mixed, and meets a long-felt want. During the past two weeks this firm has shipped Mirroroide screens to a long list of exhibitors.

WILL BUILD NEW THEATER.

C. W. Rice, of Marshfield, Wis., will erect on South Central avenue, that city, a moving picture theater to seat 700. The name of the amusement place will be the Unique.

INDIANA.

Motion pictures are regulated by a special set of rules issued by the State Fire Marshal. These rules are printed in pamphlet form and will be sent to any exhibitor in Indiana who will write for them to John J. Walsh, Factory Inspector, Indianapolis. The title reads as follows:

Rules and Regulations. For the installation, operation and maintenance of motion picture machines, and to regulate the construction and arrangement of audience rooms in which motion picture exhibitions are to be given.

Section 1. No motion picture machine or device shall at any time be operated in any building or enclosure, nor shall the public be admitted to the audience room in which such motion picture exhibit is to be given, until the installation of such machine or device and the arrangement of such audience room and its accessories have been made to fully conform to all of the provisions and requirements of the rules and regulations hereinafter specified.

Sec. 2. Every motion picture machine or device must, before being operated, be installed in a room, compartment, booth or enclosure constructed entirely of fire-resistive material, which may include only brick, tile, concrete, galvanized iron, hard asbestos board, asbestos building lumber, or their equivalent. All such rooms, compartments, booths or enclosures shall be constructed in complete conformity with the following conditions and specifications:

LOCATION.

Sec. 3. The booth must not be placed directly over an exit, and in all cases must be securely anchored or fastened so as to prevent dislodgment in cast of panic.

SIZE.

Sec. 4. Each room, compartment, booth or enclosure in which a motion picture machine or device is installed, must be not less than seven (7) feet in height, with area of floor space varying in accordance with the number of machines or devices installed in such booths, as follows:

One picture machine, 6 ft. x 8 ft.

One picture machine and one stereopticon, 9 ft. x 8 ft.

Two picture machines and one stereopticon, 12 ft. x 8 ft.

CONSTRUCTION AND ARRANGEMENT OF BOOTHS.

Sec. 5. (a) Metal or Asbestos Booths.—If the room, compartment, booth or enclosure is constructed of galvanized iron, hard asbestos board, asbestos building lumber, or their equivalent, it must be constructed and equipped substantially as follows:

Frame.—To be made of at least 1½-inch by 1½ inch by ¼-inch angle or tee irons, as follows:

Four outside horizontal members at top and bottom.

Four corner uprights.

Intermediate uprights on sides and intermediate members on roofs spaced at least every two feet.

Doorway to be two feet wide by at least five feet high, with an angle iron framing always to be placed on exterior side of booth and properly countersunk.

Covering of Booth.—Sides and top of booth and main or entrance door shall be covered with hard asbestos boards or asbestos building lumber, of at least ⅛-inch thickness, or their equivalent, or with steel or galvanized sheet iron of not less than No. 20 U. S. gage. The asbestos or its equivalent shall be so cut and arranged that vertical joints between boards shall always come over an angle or tee iron, to which it shall be securely fastened by means of proper bolts and nuts, spaced not more than six inches apart. The sheet metal shall be so cut and arranged that joints shall always come over a member, be overlapped and bolted or riveted to such member; bolts or rivets to be spaced not over three inches on centers.

Flooring.—Floor shall be made of two parts, an upper and a lower floor. Lower floor may be made of wood, ⅞-inch minimum thickness, supported on lower leg of horizontal angle irons. Resting on this floor shall be a floor made of hard asbestos board, asbestos building lumber of ⅜-inch minimum thickness, or an equally good non-combustible material.

Openings.—There shall be not more than two openings in the booth for each machine—one for observation by the operator, and one for operation of the machine. Opening for machine shall be not more than six inches high and twelve inches long. Opening for operator shall be not more than four inches wide or more than twelve inches high. The two openings for each machine shall be provided with gravity doors, constructed of metal not less than 3/16-inch in thickness; when closed they shall overlap the openings at least two inches on all sides, and be arranged to slide, without binding, in properly constructed grooves; said doors to be held open normally by use of a fine combustible cord fastened to a fusible link which melts at a temperature of 160 degrees F., the whole so arranged that the door may be easily released and closed by hand. All joints in frames to be made with 3/16-inch steel plates, to which each angle iron or tee iron shall be riveted or bolted by the use of at least two ¼-inch bolts or rivets. All bolts or rivets to have flat heads, said heads always to be placed on exterior side of booth and properly countersunk.

The main or entrance door shall be hung on at least three heavy hinges and arranged to close against a substantial metal rabbet. The door shall also be provided with a substantial spring which will keep it closed tightly.

Shelves.—All shelves, furniture and fixtures within the booth shall be constructed of incombustible material.

Ventilation.—Booths shall be provided with a ventilating inlet in each of three sides; said inlets to be fifteen inches long and three inches high, the lower side of same to be not more than three inches above floor level. Said inlets shall be covered on the outside by a wire netting of not greater than ½-inch mesh, to be firmly secured to the asbestos boards or metal by means of iron strips and screws or rivets, and on inside by gravity doors arranged to slide in properly constructed grooves, and which, when closed, shall overlap ventilator openings at least two inches on all sides; said doors to be held open normally by use of a fine combustible cord fastened to a fusible link which melts at a temperature of 160 degrees F., so arranged that the doors may be easily released and closed by hand.

Near the center of the top of the booth shall be a circular opening of not less than ten inches in diameter, the upper side of said opening to be provided with an iron flange, which flange is to be securely fastened to the tee irons supporting the roof. Securely fastened to this flange shall be a metallic vent pipe of not less than ten inches in diameter, said pipe leading to the outside of the building or to a special incombustible vent flue; all parts of vent pipe to be at least six inches from any combustible material.

For the comfort of the operator it is important to provide for a constant current of air to pass outward through the opening or vent flue at the rate of not less than thirty cubic feet per minute when the booth is in use.

(b) Brick, Tile or Concrete Booths.—If the room, compartment, booth or enclosure is constructed of brick, tile or concrete, it shall have walls not less in thickness than eight inches, except that if reinforced concrete is used the thickness need be only four inches.

The ventilation and general arrangement of the booth and the protection of openings shall conform with the requirements of sub-section (a) preceding.

(c) Portable Booths. Portable booths shall not be used in any theater or public hall in which a permanent booth has been or is installed, but shall be used only for temporary one-night exhibition of motion pictures in places of assemblage, such as halls belonging to commercial organizations, churches, schools, etc., where it is deemed impracticable to install permanent booths made in accordance with the above specifications.

In constructing a portable booth the specifications for a permanent booth shall be followed, with the exceptions given below:

1. Intermediate uprights may be spaced every four feet.

2. Special means for ventilation need not be provided except that there shall be an opening for ventilation in the top of the booth, this opening to be ten inches in diameter and a metal sleeve at least eighteen inches in height, provided with a ventilating cap, shall be attached thereto.

3. The booth may be made in a folding type so constructed that when assembled it will be rigid and all joints tight so that flames may not pass through them.

4. The base of booth shall have a flange extension outward on all four sides provided with a sufficient number of holes, through which booth may be fastened to floor.

Sec. 6. The motion picture machines must be securely fastened to the floor to prevent accidental overturning or moving of same.

Shall be equipped with a feed reel enclosed in a metal magazine constructed of 20 U. S. gauge metal, with a slot at the bottom only large enough for film to pass out, and with cover so arranged that this slot can be instantly closed. No solder to be used in the construction of this box. Door on side shall be of metal and provided with spring hinges and latch which will keep door closed tightly.

Shall be provided also with a take up reel in a magazine similar to that used to enclose feed reel. A slot to be provided only large enough to receive the film, and a door at the side to be provided to remove film. Each door must be of metal and equipped with spring hinges and latch to keep same securely closed.

A mirror must be placed in front of the condenser, so arranged as to be automatically closed when film is stationary.

Sec. 7. The arc lamp used in a motion picture machine must be constructed and installed as follows:

(a) Must be substantially constructed and entirely of metal except where the use of asbestos or similar material is necessary.

(b) Must be so designed as to provide for proper ventilation and to prevent escaping of flame from lamp when same is in operation, and must not be used for flame projection.

Sec. 8. No arc or light shall be used in any room, compartment or booth in which a motion picture machine is installed except that produced by electricity. All electric wiring must be brought into the booth in iron conduits. One light will be allowed for each machine and one for the rewinding bench, but all such lights shall be provided with wire guards, and reinforced cord shall be used for pendant purposes. If house lights are controlled from within the booth, an additional emergency control must be provided near the main exit and kept at all times in good condition.

All electrical wiring or apparatus used in connection with any audience room or located in any room, compartment, booth, or enclosure containing a motion picture machine, or in which an exhibition thereof is to be made, shall be in full compliance with the rules of the National Electrical Code.

Sec. 9. No films shall be exposed in the booth at the same time other than the one film in process of transfer to or from the machine or from the upper to lower magazine, or in process of rewinding. A separate metal case, made without solder, shall be provided for each film when the same is not in the magazine or in process of rewinding, said films to be kept in these cases. No material of a combustible nature shall be stored within any booth except the films needed for one day's operation.

Sec. 11. Neither smoking nor the keeping nor use of matches shall be permitted in any booth, room, compartment or enclosure where a motion picture machine is installed.

Sec. 12. Each machine while in operation shall be in charge of an experienced operator.

Sec. 13. The entrance door to the motion picture machine booth shall be kept closed, but not locked, when an audience is in the building.

Sec. 14. No motion picture machine shall be installed, maintained or operated in any building that does not abut directly upon a street; nor shall any such machine be installed, maintained or operated in connection with any exhibition room contained in a building occupied as a hotel, tenement house, or lodging house; nor in factories or workshops, except where the exhibition room and motion picture machine are separated from the rest of the building by unpierced fireproof walls and floors; and in no case shall the main floor of such exhibition room be more than four feet above or below the adjoining grade level.

If the walls of the auditorium contain wood studs, they shall be covered with either expanded metal lath or wire mesh and plastered with three coats of plaster, or be covered with one-half inch plaster boards and plastered or covered with metal. The joints shall be properly filled with mortar. The ceilings of all such rooms shall be plastered with three coats of plaster on wire mesh or metal lath, or covered with one-half inch plaster boards and plastered or covered with metal. If there be a basement or cellar, the ceiling under the auditorium floor must be plastered with three coats of plaster on wire mesh or expanded metal lath, or be covered with one-half inch plaster boards and plastered or covered with metal.

Any motion picture exhibition room accommodating more than three hundred people, or containing a gallery or galleries, shall be built in compliance with the requirements for theaters and opera houses.

All motion picture exhibition rooms shall be provided with at least two separate exits, one of which shall be in the front and the other in the rear, both leading to unobstructed outlets on the street. The aggregate width in feet of such exits shall be not less than one-twentieth of the number of persons to be accommodated thereby. No exits shall be less than five feet in width, and there shall be a main exit not less than ten feet in total width.

If an unobstructed exit to a street cannot be provided at the rear of such buildings, as herein specified, either an open court or a fireproof passage or corridor must be provided from rear exit to the street front, of at least four feet in width for exhibition rooms accommodating 50 persons or less, and six inches additional for each additional 50 persons accommodated by such room. Such passage must be constructed of fireproof material and must be at least ten feet high in the clear. The walls forming such passage must be at least eight inches thick, of brick or other approved fireproof material, and if there be a basement the wall on the auditorium side should either run one foot below the cellar bottom or may be carried in the cellar on iron columns and girders properly fireproofed. The ceiling of said passages, and, if there be a basement, the floor must be of fireproof construction.

If unobstructed rear exit or exits to a street are provided, the said exit or exits must be of the same total width required for the court or passage above mentioned. Said passages and exits to the street, as above, must be used for no other purposes except for exit and entrance, and must be kept free and clear.

The level of the open court or passage at the front of building shall not be greater than one step above the level of the sidewalk, and the grade shall not be more than one foot in ten, with no perpendicular rises.

All seats in any exhibition room for moving picture machines shall be not less than 31 inches from back to back and securely fastened to the floor; they shall be so arranged that there will not be more than 12 seats in a line between aisles, nor more than 6 between any seat and an aisle. All exits shall be directly accessible to aisles. No aisles shall be less than three feet in width where they begin, and shall be increased in width toward the exits three inches to every ten running feet length. All exit doors shall be arranged to swing outward and be provided with fastenings such as can be opened readily from the inside, without the use of keys or any special effort, but not locked when the room is open to the public.

All the requirements of this section relating to seats, aisles, passageways, exits and doors shall apply in connection with each open-air motion picture exhibition.

Sec. 15. Every exit doorway leading from the exhibition room shall have over the same on the auditorium side the word "EXIT" in letters not less than six inches high, or an illuminated sign with letters of the same height. Where illuminated signs are not provided, there shall be at least one red light over each doorway. The exit doorways shall be numbered with figures not less than six inches high. Light used in marking exits or lighting passageways, stairways or inclines leading from them shall not depend upon or be controlled by wires, switches or fuses located in room, compartment, booth or enclosure containing motion picture machines, but shall be controlled from the ticket office.

Sec. 16. The proprietor, or, in his absence, the manager or other representative in control of any room or building to which the public is admitted, and in which an exhibition of one or more motion picture machines is given, shall be held responsible for full compliance with the provisions of these rules and regulations, before same is opened to the public. Any operator who shall operate or cause to be operated a machine which is not installed in accordance with these provisions shall be deemed to have violated the provisions of these rules and regulations.

Sec. 17. Nothing contained in these rules and regulations shall affect any existing ordinance, rule or regulation of any city or town in the State of Indiana not less restrictive than these rules and regulations for the installation, operation and maintenance of motion picture machines and the construction and arrangements of audience rooms in which motion picture exhibitions are to be given, or affect, modify or limit the power of cities or towns in the State of Indiana to make ordinances, rules or regulations not less restrictive than these rules and regulations for the installation, operation and maintenance of motion picture machines and the construction and arrangement of audience rooms in which motion picture exhibitions are to be given.

(c) Self-closing doors must be provided on side and rear of lamp enclosure, and observation ports not larger than two inches square may be provided when closed with glass.

(d) Lamp must be controlled by a double pole switch within easy reach of operator.

(e) Conductors supplying current to lamp must not be smaller than No. 6 B. & S. gauge or its equivalent. A fireproof insulation must be used on conductors inside lamp and those connected to the arc lamp and resistance. Conductors passing through case of lamp must be protected with porcelain bushings.

(f) Resistance box must be kept not less than one (1) foot from any combustible material, or must be separated from it by a slab of slate or marble. The resistance box must be surrounded with a substantially attached metal guard having a mesh not larger than one-half inch, which guard is to be kept at least one inch from outside frame or rheostat.

LOUISE HUFF.

QUITE alone among the Lubin players stands Louise Huff. At the same time she is very much of them. Individual by reason of her type of loveliness—popular among her colleagues because of her irresistible winsomeness.

The littlest leading woman is just five feet one inch of tender, wistful charm and daintiness, with, however, an abundance of spirit and decision—as pungent as a dash of spice.

Louise Huff.

She is a Georgia Girl who has, in her short life on the screen, contributed some exquisite portraits of youth. Her career has been a singularly happy one. At the end of her school days she spent a season on the stage, then was chosen by Adolph Zukor to play with Mary Pickford in "Caprice" and one or two other pices, before she quietly entered the gates of Lubinville, two years ago.

Immediately there was sharp bidding among the various producers for her services, but in time she found her most sympathetic leading man and director in Edgar Jones. Under his guidance she has infused life and soul into some Lubin classics, the newest being a photoplay which has been described as both an idyl and an epic—"The Girl at the Lock."

The soubriquet of "The Kate Greenaway Girl of the Screen" was once bestowed upon Miss Huff by an admirer, and it has clung to her. Miss Huff has acquired some first editions of Kate Greenaway's books and has even modeled some of her quaint little dresses, coats and bonnets after the drawings of the English artist of the last generation. To a recent interviewer she confided that she would rather try to make just one Dickens character live in the theater of silence—more than a whole procession of modern girls.

Edison Night at Regent.

Star Players Appear Before Large and Enthusiastic Audience.

"EDISON NIGHT" at the Regent Theater, 116th street and Seventh avenue, New York, held Friday night, Nov. 27, proved a night edifying to both Manager George Balsdon and the Edison stars, whose presence packed the 2,000-capacity theater with enthusisatic "fans" who came to see that their favorites received a due share of the cheering.

The enterprising manager had heralded the big time for a week before that there would be an exclusive Edison program and the Edison players shown on the screen and also in the flesh to make their bow. Before 9 o'clock ticket selling had to be stopped entirely.

Attention was divided between the screen and the box nearby where sat the following Edison stars: Miss Miriam Nesbitt, Miss Mabel Trunnelle, Miss Gladys Hulette, Marc MacDermott, Augustus Phillips, Andy Clark and Herbert Prior. Manager Horace G. Plimpton and Frank Bannon from the Edison studio were also present.

Theater Manager Balsdon introduced each player and each was roundly greeted by his particular following. Little "Andy," of course, made his usual hit. The women players were each presented with a huge bouquet from the audience amidst appreciative cheers.

Seven thousand feet of film were shown, comprising the following plays: "What Could She Do?" "The Pines of Lory," "The Everlasting Triangle," and "Getting Andy's Goat."

After the festivities, Manager Balsdon showed his appreciation by wining and dining the Edison contingent at the Hotel Cecil. Manager Balsdon is so convinced of the drawing power of his idea that he plans to have another group of Edison players and another Edison night.

British Notes.

A glowing instance of short-sighted patriotism in furnished by the action today (Nov. 12) of the London County Council in refusing to renew the licenses of a number of moving picture theaters in the metropolis owned by alien enemies. But the embargo does not even stop at this if early reports represent the position faithfully, and picture shows employing alien enemies (Germans, Hungarians, Austrians and Turks) are also to be compulsorily closed. Thus a picture show owned by—say a Turk for instance—but worked by a British manager, British staff, British built and showing British pictures, must close its doors irrespective of the fact that it may occasion distress by unemployment amongst a number of British people. It is reasonable to conclude that the legislators responsible for this serious misuse of their power have been influenced by an evening newspaper which since the war broke out has repeatedly urged the government to confiscate alien owned entertainment houses. How this news will be received by the trade cannot be anticipated in definite form, so the events of next week will be awaited anxiously.

Manufacturers and renters are now preparing their programmes for the Christmas season. The pantomime film will in all probability be revived at fifty per cent. of the exhibitions, and as they are principally stock subjects there will be no difficulty in supplying all demands. The British & Colonial Co. announce a seasonable drama introducing the present conflict under the title of "Christmas Without Daddy." The Christmas season promises to be exceptionally busy this year, especially those who will cater to pantomime, pictures or children's subjects. Some of the theaters are abondoning the production of expensive pantomimes, while from other economic reasons the moving picture will appeal to many patrons of the stage as a suitable Yuletide attraction.

The first trade exhibition of the Transatlantic Film Co.'s new serial, "The Trey o' Hearts," was shown this week in London, and from the favorable reception accorded to it the subject will prove quite as popular in Great Britain as its predecessor, "Lucille Love." Even though released in sections, a film 30,000 feet in length must possess many merits out of the ordinary run before it will attract the eye of the expert reviewer, who is now an indispensable adjunct to a moving picture theater of any pretensions. Yet judging from the bookings "The Trey o' Hearts" looks like being a winner.

R. E. Aitken, of the "Mutual" organization is on a brief visit to Europe and is making his headquarters, while in England, at the offices of the Western Import Co.

Mr. Andrew Carnegie recently gave $80,000 for three additional free libraries in the suburbs of Manchester and in opening the first of these, on November 4th, the Lord Mayor of Manchester dropped a suggestion worthy of the best considerations of the Pittsburgh millionaire. In pointing out the value of moving pictures as an aid to teaching history and the life stories of our great men and their ability to cultivate amongst boys and girls a taste for literature, he suggested the use of the kinematograph as a necessary adjunct to the free libraries of the city.

Illustrative of the vigilance of the police, is the following experience of a Downeaster exhibitor. The other day he sent his manager to Leeds to secure a substitute for a film that had not arrived. Before returning he wired, "Keep airship off. Arriving 7.30. When the earth trembles." This fearsome message must have inspired the post-office clerk to a stern sense of duty for he communicated with the police, who were soon on the spot. Explanations, however, were easy, and the sequel was a fine free advertisement for the Lubin drama.

Before the burial of the late Field-Marshall Lord Roberts the Samuelson Film Co. had set to work upon the production of a motion picture biography of the famous soldier. They are now working day and night reproducing at their studios just outside London the principal events and scenes in his long and varied career. The film, which is in three reels, is to be released in a fortnight.

Cherry Kearton has transferred his activities as a war photographer from Belgium to Turkey, and has earned the distinction of being the first man to get films through from the Eastern theater of war. Preliminary preparations for war as shown in Constantinople and Jerusalem. The first of these topicals to arrive is 550 feet in length.

Paul Kimberley is exceedingly busy unpacking the first instalments to reach London of the Thanhouser's lengthy serial "The Million Dollar Mystery." There are exhibitors on this side who think a 47,000 foot film too much of a good thing, but Mr. Kimberley and his staff are optimistic of its success.

LOUISVILLE DAILY INAUGURATES ESSAY CONTEST FOR JUVENILES.

A great deal of enthusiasm is being stirred up among juvenile motion picture patrons by the new censored picture shows given for school children at the Mary Anderson Theater, Louisville. The Louisville Evening Post has inaugurated a series of contests in connection with these shows These contests provide for essays on the pictures to be run the following Saturday, the essays not to be over 350 words in length. For instance the film "Niagara Falls" was recently shown, and the contest for the week was an essay on the falls. The prizes consist of two tickets to each of the ten writers who submit the best papers to the "Moving Picture Contest Committee" on the newspaper. Names of the successful contestants are printed in Friday evening's paper, and the tickets are mailed to the winners in time for use Saturday morning. Another contest was one on "Log Rolling in Maine."

This was very interesting to the children as they have been studying about lumbering in Maine, and the contest worked well in with their school studies. Only children of grade school age are permitted to take part in these events. In the log rolling contest the first prize was six tickets for a theater box party. A second and third prize of four tickets each and six prizes of two tickets each were also awarded. The proposition from the standpoint of the box office is working out very nicely. The contest gets the children prepared on the subject and they are better able to appreciate the pictures. Larger attendances are present at every Saturday performance just now. Other pictures recently shown were "The Boy Scouts" and "Catching Codfish."

Advertising for Exhibitors

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

Traveling Round.

EVENTUALLY the "autogobile" pictured in the department in the issue dated November 14 is going to land in Los Angeles to become the property of Charles Chaplin. But it is going to travel by short jumps and have quite a noise made about it.

It will be remembered that F. D. Stanton, of the Orpheum theater, Gardner, Mass., offered to loan the advertising device to any brother exhibitor who would pay the freight and ship it to the next town on the list. Steve Farrar, of the Colonial Amusement Company, Eldorado, Ill., was the first to speak up, so the vehicle was shipped to him (and, by the way, at a freight rate of less than five dollars). From there it will go to Harrisburg and Mt. Carmel, Ill. After that is open time unless there have been arrangements recently made, but it is planned to move the machine in a general westerly direction, short jumps, and give all those who desire a chance to use it for a day or two.

Even in a "hard" town for press work the novelty of this idea will get the story into the paper as local news. If you are anywhere between Illinois and Los Angeles, speak up quickly, addressing Mr. Stanton as above.

We would add the suggestion that each exhibitor forward to Mr. Stanton a complete set of the press matter obtained in his town, to the end that a scrap book of the car may be compiled and presented to Mr. Chaplin. We will donate the book if Mr. Stanton will keep it up.

Here is one of the best advertising stunts that has been offered for a long time, and the freight on a short jump is so slight that there is practically no expense. Write in quickly that Mr. Stanton may lay out a route. Your only obligation is to pay the freight from the last town to yours and see it properly shipped to the next town.

Just in passing you'll notice that Mr. Farrar is still awake on his job.

The K-W Ad. Book.

The Kineamatograph Weekly, London, has just issued a handbook, The Showman's Advertising Book, which, while purely local in its general trend, will give American exhibitors many useful hints. It is written by Low Warren, acting editor of the Kinematograph Weekly, and in simple and intelligible fashion takes up the various phases of the work. On the proposition that any good book will help, it should be added to the library of the student of advertising.

Another Stinger.

Another company is trying to dispose of its books on photoplay writing through the exhibitors. It offers to send a copy of the book and ten circulars to any exhibitor who will undertake the sale. The book sells for $1.50, of which the exhibitor gets half.

On a quick look this proposition seems a good one, but it is reactionary. The circular is the same lying stuff that all of the schools and snide book concerns offer. "Anyone" can write plays, "no literary talent is required" and all the rest of the glittering promises. We do not know this particular book, but we do know that a concern that will advertise downright lies is not the sort that brings out a good book, or even makes the slightest effort to do so. They crib from other and more reliable works and make a hash of the ideas during the process of stealing. It is not the book with which we have a quarrel. It is the effort to sell through the misleading statements. These circulars are to be posted in the lobby and the screen is to be worked by means of slides. If your patrons, misled by the statements on screen and circular, purchase a book from you and fail, they will hold you responsible and your loss will be greater, in the long run, than any profit you can make from the sale of the book. If your patrons ask you about play writing, tell them frankly that few out of the thousands of aspirants succeed. If they persist, give them information, and the fault is theirs, but if you coax your patrons with these printed lies, you are getting your money under false pretenses, and they will hold you responsible when they discover that not everyone can write and sell plays and that comparatively few succeed.

The publishers point with pride to the fact that their advertisements are accepted by the popular magazines. This is nothing. The indictment of one school proprietor was based almost entirely on his advertisement in the Motion Picture Story Magazine the day the case came before the Federal Grand Jury.

There are enough fakers coaxing incompetents into the script writing game without you helping. Keep out and keep your reputation clean.

Now e. o. d.

The Brigham Bulletin, which was run by the Alta theater, Brigham City, Utah, in conjunction with the publisher of one of the weekly papers, has been cut down from a daily to three times a week, but it has gained in circulation since the new issue is now delivered to merchants in each town of Box Elder county and by them distributed to their patrons. This leaves the Milledgeville, Ga., daily in possession of the field again. The Korford and Ryan scheme, as we understand it, is to stand sponsor for the sheet while the publisher foots the bills and takes the profits. It would seem that they are being cut down on the number of readers, but they get a couple in each issue and a quarter-page advertisement, and the paper profits by the novelty of the idea. The big advantage of the scheme lies in the fact that they can advertise a coming feature to better advantage than in the weekly issue and they get about 1,700 circulation in nearby towns without distributing cost.

Good Inside.

We like the program proper of the Olympic theater, Bellaire, O., but the cover page is too crowded. There are four banks, two lines and the title all on a sheet 4¼ by 6. Inside they use day and date, handle the type well and use a ten-point face to tell about the subjects. The back gives the more important underline and the week's regular specialties. Use an open first page. Too much is apt to discourage the reader before he turns to the real meat and so he never gets that far. They handle better the newspaper advertising where they double lead the letter press and make it easy to read. Nothing discourages a willing soul more quickly than a heavy mass of unleaded type or too much bold face. Mere blackness is not a virtue when overdone. It should be used for emphasis and not as a body type.

They have five and ten cent days, and they are careful to specify just which are which. This is an excellent point where there is a sliding scale, but a sliding scale is not always good. The switch in prices is explained in a footnote on the back page, their Paramount contract calling for that admission.

Careless Cuss.

R. W. Buzzell writes that he encloses a card that got him the baby carriage trade. Maybe he meant to, but he is a bad second to a man who the other day sent us three letters. The first was our own to him and the second said: "I enclosed yours instead of mine. Here is mine." It wasn't, but it came in the third cover. That came. We are still looking for the card. The letter is not strictly advertising, but what do you think of the house?

> Some day when we are not so busy getting business and taking care of what we have got, we are going to have a set of pictures made of this REGULAR photoplay house and send them in to you.
> We note your criticism of our invitation cards which we felt the same way about ourselves, but our president took the copy down to a printer who was in reality only the owner of a Multigraph machine and the work came back to us so late it was impossible to get others done in time, because last May 5th, when the foundation was laid, it was decided to open on September 5th, and the house was opened ON TIME.
>
> The house did not change hands nor management; it was built NEW entirely of cement, even the big operating booth.
> Also a cement room for the rectifier and rheostat. We use a 50-ampere rectifier drawing 46 amperes for a picture 13 by 15 feet (approximately) thrown 70 feet to a mirroroid screen.
> Projection apparatus consists of two newest Simplex machines and Gundlach lenses.
> The rheostat connection is on a double throw, which gives us alternating current should a tube give out in the middle of a reel, then we can throw over on the alternating current while tube is being changed (?)
> The front of my office, ten feet distant from the booth, has a plate glass front so that I can see my projection even when I am writing this.
> Mr. William Cook, of the Springfield Union, is in charge of the projection and delivers the goods. Have also worked as chief operator myself and it is lots of sport to see which one of us, myself or the operator, can find some way to improve the projection. We use a Mortimer film cleaner with good results.
>
> Last June, when I was certain I was to come here to manage the theater, the first thing I asked the owners was to send a subscription to the World, which is absolutely indispensable to me.
> The spelling of that title Lord Chumley was the fault of the newspaper which thought it could improve on my spelling. The picture was the Klaw and Erlanger production from the special feature department of the General Film Co.
> Yes, we had a big crowd at the special performance as a result of our invitation to teachers, school board, clergymen, city officials, business men of the city and others who were delighted with our program, which consisted of the Vitagraph feature, "Love, Luck and Gasolene."
> "One Wonderful Night," "A Million Bid," "Home, Sweet Home," and "Wrath of the Gods" have been among our best offerings since opening, and "The Good-for-nothing (Anderson) made the biggest hit.
> Our Wurlitzer $1,500 size is a drawing card with Miss Julia Nolan in charge.
> Our various friends in the trade have been in to see us and are all agreed that we have a regular house.
> I noticed a while back you asked for Wesley of Gardner, of "We Ley Says So" fame.

Wesley died of pneumonia some time last May if I remember correctly. A good fellow and a hustler.

Just at present the thing which interests me most in the World is what Mr. Rothapfel has to say.

Please excuse all mistakes as, like Wesley, we never did claim to be a stenographer.

A little card enclosed which has helped to get the baby carriage trade started, this being a residential theater in the most densely populated ward in the city, where most of the 3,000 employees of the General Electric plant live.

The next time I get to New York I certainly will make another effort to see you and Mr. Richardson of the projection department and get acquainted.

If you ever stray this way don't fail to stop with us, as we always have an extra bed ready and the latch is always out.

Many thanks for all the help we have received from your columns.

Getting the Churches.

Charles F. Kear, of the Opera House, Minersville, Pa., is the first to go on record as getting in on the Christmas Ship movement. Possibly others beat him to it, but he beats them in here. This is a copy of a letter sent to the eleven ministers of Minersville:

My dear Reverend: I have set aside next Thursday evening, October 22d, to be known as "Christmas Ship Night" at the Opera House. The object being to help raise funds for Christmas Gifts for the orphans caused by the conflict now raging in Europe. Fifty per cent. of the entire receipts will be sent to the North American Publishing Company of Philadelphia to be used as they deem proper for the most advantageous, needy, and worthy purposes. Due notice has been given of this entertainment in all the Public Schools, and if not contrary to the customs of your parish, and you feel that it will not establish a precedent, any mention that you care to make to your parishioners to my mind will help along this work considerably.

The prices for the entertainment will be 5 and 10 cents; at these prices there should be many who will be able to contribute their little mite for this cause. A similar letter has been mailed to all the clergy in Minersville. Thanking you kindly in advance for anything you may do to further the interests of this movement, I am, Running the Name.

J. H. Sommers, of the Bungalo theater, St. Maries, Ida., and part owner of the combination house in the same town, raises the question of where to put the name of the house. He also advances a unique scheme in paying the bill distributor a bonus proportioned on the sale of seats. That is a new one on us. How about you? Mr. Sommers writes:

I have digested so much of your good stuff (as my few hand bills will show) that to-day in going over your pages I really felt that I was very much obligated to you and that even in a small way I should come across with something. I have used your suggestions to advantage many a time and, with a few original ideas added to some, find that your department is my main sail. Not meaning to spread on the salve, I can really say that it was your department that grabbed my subscription to the World. Of course I now read it from cover to cover and enjoy it all.

My main business getter is a hand bill that will be read. Second properly distributed. One without the other is as bad as not having either one. Before my bills go to the printer I make sure that they will be read and before they leave my hands I must positively know they will reach each house in the town. I have an old man who is very faithful to me and I let him understand that the more people that come in on the days that he peddles bills the more money he gets for his work. He would not miss a house if it cost him his left leg; consequently, bills read— bills properly distributed —good business.

A question in my mind is whether the name of the theater should be at the top of the bill or at the bottom, or maybe both? I have more success by using a catch heading and throughout the reading use the name of the theater in the usual run of type, finishing up strong with the house name and slogan. It seems to me that where hand bills are used that continually use:

BUNGALO THEATER TO-NIGHT
SO AND SO AND SUCH

does not get the readers as some catchy announcement would. In my case it does not get the business. You will note my bills all have some heading supposed to attract attention and then hold it.

I might write on something else, but will shoot this to you and if it is worth anything to your department I will be pleased, as I owe all that I could possibly give and then some. You will note that each bill has an explanatory note on it, as I try and follow the local conditions at the time of turning out my advertising matter.

We agree with Mr. Sommers that the cut-and-dried bill will never get one anywhere, so that the house name should run where it falls. As a rule using the stuff he does with a catchline at the top to get the attention, the name falls to the bottom, but it could, as well, be run in the middle of the sheet and then again at the bottom. It will help a lot to get a distinctive type face or cut and always use that so that the name even when not seen close enough to be read, will be associated with the theater. Since this house is the Bungalo a bungalow cut might be freely used. If nothing better offers the Berwick Border of the American Type Foundry shows (No 61) a small cut of a house, running from twelve to thirty-six point. They are to be had at a little expense and a sprinkling of these would identify any bill.

One bill, gotten out while the streets were being graded, adapted an idea in this department to local conditions. It ran in part:

DANGER!!
HORRIBLE DISEASE
Is Spreading, Called MUD-ON-THE-FEET-IS
Can Be Cured by Following the Prescription
Given Below:

Put on your rubbers and get out your umbrella (use as customary) and walk down town with fifteen cents which hand to the cashier at St. Maries photoplay house, then enter and digest the following doses of gloom chasers.

Most of the dodgers start off with an exclamatory line such as Lest," "Found," "Insted," etc. Some of them we think, run a little too much copy, but they are smartly written and so are more apt to be read through. Our own preference, though, would be for less type and a few larger lines. As an example, "The two best programs in some time" is better deserving the black type than Mutual Movies. The latter could be better carried in the now familiar clock trade mark. "Keystone Comedy" is a better line than the title of the comedy, if both lines cannot be played up, but Mr. Sommers is still educating the printer in type matters, and there is hope. If he wants to look it up, we think the best display comes on the bill headed "A large, long laugh," though the best text is on the bill quoted from. The former shows the features at a glance, talks of the two features for the two days and runs the other titles in boxes. The setting is open and easily read.

Lissum Here.

You would not go over to a neighboring town and steal a ten-cent piece from a brother exhibitor's cash drawer, would you?

Certainly not.

But if you ship to him next and you let your operator ship in such a shape that the next man's operator must spend an hour or so getting the stuff in shape to show, you are stealing more than ten cents from him. Ever think of it in that light?

Doesn't Own It.

J. W. Llewlleyn, of the Vaudette, West Point, Ga., sends in a few copies of the Leader with the explanation that he does not own the paper but just advertises in it. If they give coupons to advertisers he'll own it pretty soon. One issue has 105 column inches of space in four different advertisements, and to top that Mr. Llewlleyn uses Carl Laemmle's pet slogan, "Use the brains, &c.," to advertise a licensed and Paramount program. We gather that it does not put a mortgage on the house to take a page in the Leader, but at that it is live stuff, and it brings results. One good line reads:

No matter how dark and stormy the night—
You owe it to yourself to come out and see—

The titles of the attractions follow. It is good wet weather stuff. It may be a few weeks yet before he beats the coat hanger, but we still have hopes.

What?

Paramount Pickings, Minneapolis, starts off a recent paragraph with these kind words:

Epes Winthrop Sargeant, who conducts a department of knocks intermingled with a few boosts in the "Moving Picture World," states we swiped our late fables from Brother George E. Carpenter of "Real Reels" fame. He is absolutely wrong. we merely borrowed them for the time being. However, we agree with him they were good fables—those in "Real Reels," we mean.

Huh. Hand a dog a bad name, then take the license tag off his collar so's the dog catchers can get him!

This is not a department of knocks, dear lady—at least we think it is the lady editor what wrote the paragraph. It is a department of good advice to those who can see it in that light. We casually mentioned that the Pickings fables looked like George Carpenter's—and were not credited. That's all. It is journalistic courtesy to credit "lifts." Chesterfield gets credit, and he's dead, and doesn't care. Why not Carpenter?

Good!

Tally, Jr., is writing in the Tallygram, the publication of Tally's Broadway theater, Los Angeles, a series of articles on picture players and picture making. Of course he has exceptional advantages in being right on the ground, but that does not detract from the cleverness of the thought. It makes stuff that will be taken home—along with the advertising matter the issue carries. You may not have his chances, but you can follow his idea and make your stuff so readable that it will go home when the patron does. Some business concerns make a lot of money baling their waste paper, but this does not apply to theater programs.

Can It be True?

The Third Street theater, Easton, Pa., says it knows of a town in Jersey with 15,000 inhabitants and no picture theater. It seems too good to be true, but perhaps they all go over to Easton to the Third Street and the Northampton. We didn't believe there was a town of fifteen hundred anywhere without at least one show. But the Third Street always means what it says. Perhaps you can coax the address.

THE PHOTOPLAYWRIGHT

Conducted by EPES WINTHROP SARGENT

INQUIRIES.

Questions concerning photoplay writing addressed to this department will be replied to by mail if a fully addressed and stamped envelope accompanies the letter, which should be addressed to this department. Questions should be stated clearly and should be typewritten or written with pen and ink. Under no circumstances will full manuscripts or synopses be criticized, whether or not a fee is sent therefor.

Are You Sure?

ARE you certain sure that your stuff is as good as you think it is? Lately we took on a new pupil. Her scripts were pretty to look at, neatly and correctly typed, on the right sort of paper and in the right sort of envelopes, but the two she picked as the best examples of her work were both bad when you stopped looking and read them. What she called her best was utterly impossible because without any reason or explanation men and women did the most remarkable things; things in direct contradiction to the way real men and women would act.

Probably she would have screamed with laughter had any one suggested that she write a story about a horse running an aeroplane, and yet she had developments just as much opposed to real life, but because she would have had no story had not her people acted as she indicated, she made them perform the most impossible acts without taking the trouble to even attempt to explain their peculiar actions. She is above the average of intelligence, and she avoided the usual beginners' mistakes, but she made the greater error of overlooking the probabilities and forcing the action. She could see humor in the point she was aiming at and it did not matter that the bullet did a serpentine dance on the way to the bull's-eye.

Her second contribution she admitted fell down about half-way through, but she explained she had to have some sort of finish and she got the best finish she could think of, though she knew that the finish did not belong. More than that, she had her character drawing all wrong and did not realize that about the middle of the play she passed from comedy to drama. She tried to finish as a comedy and fell down so hard she knocked two of the serial numbers off her typewriter.

Now, she was positive that she had one good plot and half of another plot. Lacking a nice literary sense, she was justified, from her point of view in thinking so. She was, from her point of view, justified in feeling that one of these stories should have sold, and yet that story was a virtual insult to every exhibitor of motion pictures in the country and this fact never even occurred to her.

In the Jewish drama the villain is almost always shown as a man with red hair, because there are so few red-headed Jews and so the least offense will be given by showing them to be such. In this the Ghetto dramatists have shown good taste that all too often photoplay writers lack. It is possible to be entertaining or dramatic without being offensive, most particularly to those who are the actual users of the story.

It is not enough that you have written your story in precise technical form.

It is not enough that there really is a plot developed to the best advantage.

It is also necessary that the writer shall possess literary skill and discrimination, and it may be that this is what is the matter with your script. Think it over.

Study the Comments.

One chap writes that he studies the Comments on the Films each week and when he sees that a story started too late or too soon or ended too soon or ran past the climax or something like that he tries either to see the play on the screen or looks up the synopsis in the Stories of the Film to see if he can discover the fault from the printed story and in that way he gains many helpful hints.

This is an intelligent way to study. Too many readers of this department study this page and merely read the rest of the paper. There is helpful material in every page, including the advertisements. Get your money's worth.

Property Lists.

Margaret Keller writes that she always sends a property list with her script because from her experience on the stage she knows the need of a list of props.

She is working overtime. Few directors give a list of more than the essential properties, and many of them give no list at all, turning over a carbon of the script to the boss carpenter or the property man and letting him get out the props himself.

In a stage play the properties must be on hand at each performance or the show is stopped, but there is a less immediate need of properties in making a picture, and it is always possible to stop a moment and wait until the property man can dig out what is wanted.

In consequence the property list merely cumbers the script and does no good whatever. Every useless appendage, such as a property list, leader list or anything of that sort, is a detriment and not a help and should be omitted.

Too Fine.

Studying the screen to get technique is all right, but one recent correspondent carries it a bit too far. He writes that in a recent story he notices that the girl comes out of a fisherman's hut with black stockings on. In the next scene, on the shore, she has white stockings on. He adds:

> Of course this was the director's fault. The author, no doubt, when he wrote the scenario, put in a flash to consume the time required for Mary to change her stockings; but the director evidently did not understand the purpose of the flash, so he cut it out. I would infer that the scenario as originally submitted, read something like this:
> SCENE 26—EXTERIOR FISHERMAN'S HUT. Mary, in middy suit and BLACK stockings, comes out of hut; carries white stockings in hand; exits.
> SCENE 27—FLASH back to 24—Billyum waiting in boat.
> SCENE 28—ROCKY SHORE. Enter Mary, in middy suit and WHITE stockings; carries black stockings in hand; throws them on ground; exits.
> Of course, it isn't exactly necessary to have Mary carry her black stockings with her the last time, as it would be evident to the audience that she had taken a foot bath and thrown the black hose away.

It is the director's fault, but not in the way this writer means. It is clear that there is no reason for a change of stockings. It follows, then, that there was no scene written in to break the change. It is merely that when the scenes before the hut were played the actress wore black stockings. In the other scenes—perhaps on another day—she forgot and wore white stockings instead. The director did not notice it and so it passed. It was careless production and not careless treatment of the script.

This may serve as a hint to others who may note similar confusions without understanding. All scenes before the hut are taken at one time. All scenes on the shore are taken at another time, perhaps on another day. Scenes No. 26 and No. 28 are not played in their regular order, and so these costume mistakes creep in. Writing in that No. 27 without some reason for the change of stockings will do no good whatever.

How Often.

"If the script does not sell the second time out, I retire it," explains a writer. "I am certain that it is not right."

Possibly she is correct in regard to her own work, but the system is wrong. If it were always lack of merit that gave reason for rejection, then a second return should be convincing, but there are a hundred reasons other than that to affect acceptance. If you are reasonably certain that your script is good, send it to every company dealing with that sort of stuff, then, after a time, fix it up and send out again. For that matter a story may be rejected by all, be sent out a second time without revision and sell to one of the rejecting editors. Of course it takes money for stamps, but so long as there is a chance the odds in your favor are greater than most gambling games. Be a sport and gamble a little until repeated rejections convince you. But be pretty thoroughly certain before you start in to gamble that you have not stacked the cards against yourself.

Cutting the Percentage.

Now and then some disgruntled person will point out that studio editors say that they buy only about two out of every hundred scripts and that the whole thing is a swindle. Here are two extracts from a recent inquiry that explain why some of the stuff is not purchased:

> Is it necessary to write plays for any length of time before presenting them for sale?
> Can I sell one play to more than one producer?

Is it any wonder that so small a percentage is available when such inexperienced writers supply the greater part of the submissions?

Ones and Twos.

Some companies seem to make a practice of buying one-reel stories, padding them up and releasing as two reels, paying the author only for one reel. In the case of able writers, this is distinctly unfair. An author is entitled to the courtesy of elaborating his script where he is competent to do so and a fair-minded editor will give him the opportunity. And the funny part is that the offender is an officer of the P. A. L.

We have worked past the point where an editor expects to take a script for the idea and fix it up for the director. We have men and women now who can write stories that can go to the director about as they stand, and it is not just to them to reconstruct the script whether it is built up to two parts or not. There is an increasing number of authors who in a nice way are standing up for the courtesy due them, and in time we hope to see it the general practice to let the author make his own changes. When that time comes the releases of a studio will not all carry the same earmarks.

Breaking.

Not many writers realize the value of the break scene in dodging difficult stuff. In a recent story it was desired to show a quarry explosion. The chances are that to use the friction machine generally employed by contractors would necessitate sending out and hiring a machine and possibly a man to work it and make the connections. Here is how the scene was originally written:

17—Quarry—Men in foreground, but to one side, to show blast—Dennis pulls the handle—blast shows in background all watching. Men run toward blast.

There was nothing in particular in this scene other than that an expert handler of explosives would be needed to run the wires, make the connections and run things generally. To get him it would be necessary to arrange with a contractor. It might mean an expense of ten dollars. Here is the way the scene would run:

17—Quarry—Men in foreground—Dennis pulls handle.

18—Back of No. 17 explode a smoke bomb and cut in on the instant of the explosion.

19—Back to No. 17—Men start running toward blast.

Now, any small box with an air pump so it will do the handle can be worked will do for the detonator and the close up of the blast makes a more impressive scene. Incidentally using a smoke bomb gives them a chance to use the yellow smoke and get a stronger effect.

There was no need for cutting back for the sake of continuity, but breaking the scenes meant a saving of time and ten dollars, and writers who thoughtfully save ten dollars for the boss two or three times in a script often get one of the ten spots added to their checks.

Here is a way to get around a railroad set:

23—Railroad station—train comes in—Betty alights—all crowd forward to greet her—they pass out of scene.

There is nothing the matter with that except that it is a country railroad station and the whole company had to be taken several miles out, perhaps, to get the station and the train. But work it this way:

23—Back of station—crowd waiting—they hear the train—hustle out of scene to track platform.

25—Back to No. 23—Bill goes to corner of station—looks—waves cap—Betty comes around corner with crowd—all excited—Betty into wagon out of picture.

Now, perhaps some shed near the studio can be used. If there is no stock picture of the train they need only to send a photographer out after it instead of the entire company.

Like all good things the break scene can be overworked, but it comes in handy at times. If there is much to be done around the station it will be worth while taking the company along, but just one scene can be dodged very nicely.

Still Good.

Some time since we advised writers to get stamps in the six, eight and ten cent denominations, holding that a multiplicity of twos on a high weight letter looked amateurish. A letter from Mrs. Bertie Moyers, of Tampa, leads to an amendment. Get them, but lock them up if you have kiddies around. She bought a lot of tens and her youngsters thought they were ones and mailed them out on postcards, giving our Uncle Sam and the postal deficit a clear profit of nine cents each. With this emendation the advice still stands, unless you happen to be color blind yourself.

The Best Method.

Just now a man wanted to know the best method of working and we could only tell him that the method that gave him the best results was the best method—for him.

There is no best method because people are not all alike. There are many ways by which one end may be arrived at, and only experimenting will discover the most effective way.

Personally we work according to our mood. Sometimes we plot to fit a certain general type of player, sometimes we work to fit a special player, sometimes we look for a good climax and work back from that, sometimes we get a good start and see what happens. If you can train yourself to work any old way it is better for you, but if you are so constituted that you must have one precise plan of work, try all the schemes and work the way that gives you the best results.

He Didn't Curl.

Do you remember the chap who wrote that he was going to take our advice and curl up and die? Well, he didn't. He figured it out that he was disgruntled and discouraged because he had not succeeded where he had been told that the writing of scripts was so easy. Now he is working again, but he is working with the knowledge that the goal is far beyond and he has no business getting discouraged this side of three years. By that time, if he keeps, on, he will not have any excuse for being discouraged, for now he has buckled down to work, he already shows improvement.

Absorbing It.

Sometimes it is a bit discouraging to get stung. Lately a man wrote and asked some questions. He was replied to. He wrote and gave thanks, telling how very much good this department did him each week. He gave the impression he could not sleep Friday night waiting for Saturday to come so he could sop up some more knowledge. Also he asked some more questions. He was answered and the suggestion made to him that he come to one of the Inquest meetings. He came back with some more questions, one being, "What is the Inquest Club?" And he probably spoke the truth when he said that he read the department every week, but what he reads doesn't do him a particle of good because he does not absorb knowledge. It is better to take one single fact and make that intimately your own than to read a hundred facts and not remember one.

Jones on Leaders.

Marc Edmund Jones said something the other night. He remarked that he used leaders to excess, knowing that many of them would not go in, but knowing, also, that he could, in this manner, convey to the director a better idea of the situation. The idea is both good and bad, bad in that the excess of leader might convey the idea that it would require too much titling to get the idea over, and good in that the director should be given the fullest help. There might be some way to get this explanation in without giving them the appearance of leaders. It should be possible to give a sort of explanation at the end of a scene, perhaps like this:

> 10th Street—Jim meets Edith—he bows—she affects not to see the salute—passes on. NOTE—It should be made as plain as possible that Jim does not realize Edith's anger over the quarrel in scene five. He finds for the first time that she is still angry.

That would give a full idea of the scene to the director at the particular moment that he makes that particular scene, and this explanation, given only where necessary, might enable the producer to avoid many of the breaks that arise from an imperfect appreciation of the meaning of a scene. He has, of course, read the script; perhaps has studied it, but at the moment he is working the "outside stuff" and does not remember the stuff he made yesterday in the library set—or may make to-morrow.

It should be understood that the script is not to be loaded down with useless explanation, but unless the action of a scene—taken apart from all other action—is self explanatory, tell it there.

Henry Albert Phillips suggests an Author's Note as a preface to the action script, but the time to give the explanation is at the time the particular action is to be made. It must be remembered that scenes are not played in rotation, but that all scenes in one set or location are made at one time without reference to consecutive numbering.

Writing Scenes.

It is pretty confusing to know just how to write when one company asks for from twenty to thirty scenes to the reel and another wants sixty, but it really is very simple. Write the proper number of scenes that you need, whether they be twenty or forty. The company that wants a greater number can split up these scenes into as many pieces as they wish, for that is about all that the cut back amounts to, as a rule. The main point is to get the story down in what seems to you to be the proper number. If the story is good and is told well, the number of scenes will not matter. It is a mistake to try and force your story to a given number of scenes. Let it run as it should and leave the rest to the company, feeling assured that if the story is right the matter of scenes will be easily adjusted. A single scene, normally written, may be run into five by making a couple of close up pictures of a part of the action. The scene may be played as you have written it and yet make five scenes, as scenes are counted, or two of your scenes may be split into each other to make ten scenes.

Values.

Most beginners fail to value their scenes properly. If Tom and Lillian have a quarrel, nothing else can happen until the quarrel is done, though the quarrel may be unimportant of itself. All the tedious business is run through with at an expense of time and film where it might be possible to cut over to something else after ten feet and come back for another ten feet of the finish where Tom storms out of the room with a "farewell forever."

When you plan a scene ask yourself just what there is to the scene that makes it necessary. Then ask yourself just how much of it really is necessary. If you need a forty foot quarrel, run forty feet, but if you can cut to twenty by using a five foot break, then break and save fifteen feet of film and a drag in the action.

And be careful of the value of your words. Recently a new writer contended that he had a short scene because it ran only two lines. This was the scene:

14—Dining room—Father, Mother, Amy, Paul and Ethel enter—they sit at table and dine—after dinner father says he is going to the theater—exits.

It was a short scene in the number of words used, but "they dine" would mean at least a thousand feet of film to get convincing action. A leader was suggested and the amended scene read:

Leader—That evening. Father goes to the theater.

14—Dining room—Family at table—about done—father rises—shows theater tickets—exits.

That scene would run ten feet. Five to eight feet for the leader means fifteen or eighteen feet in all. A nice study of values is part of the training of the real writer and instinct will not replace actual study. It is study that brings the instinctive sense of values.

Manufacturers' Notice.

IT is an established rule of this department that no apparatus or other goods will be endorsed or recommended editorially until the excellence of such articles have been demonstrated to its editor.

Important Notice.

Owing to the mass of matter awaiting publication it is impossible to reply through the department in less than two or three weeks. In order to give prompt service, those sending four cents, stamps (less than actual cost), will receive carbon copy of the department reply, by mail, without delay. Special replies by mail on matters which cannot be replied to in the department one dollar.

The first seventy-four questions are now ready, and printed in neat booklet form. They may be obtained by remitting 25 cents, money or stamps, to the editor. Every live, progressive operator should get a copy. You may be surprised at the number of questions you cannot answer without a lot of study. Canadians should send P. O. M. O., or coin only.

Question No. 63.

Best answer will be published, and the names of others sending in replies of excellence will appear in the Roll of Honor. Theater managers looking for high-class men will do well to watch the Roll of Honor.

What are the essentials of a good operating room? Look out! This involves quite a number of things. Don't overlook any of them. What should be the minimum dimensions when one projector is used? When two are used? When two and a dissolver are used? What size should the observation ports be and how ought they to be fitted? Explain your ideas by sketch, if necessary.

Roll of Honor.

The Roll of Honor on Question No. 57 is made up of the following names: Joseph H. M. Smith, Fort Worth, Texas; A. C. Stewart, Waitsburg, Washington; John Solar, Watertown, New York; L. C. La Grow, Albany, New York; J. I. Roberts, Nashville, Tennessee; G. D. Bullock, Hobart, Indiana; J. W. Seward, Reading, Pennsylvania; Alfred Jenkins, Detroit, Michigan; M. W. Larmour, Waco, Texas, and Montreal, Canada.

I have selected the reply of John Solar for publication, supplemented by the first part of the reply by Albert Jenkins. Friend Solar's answer ranks among the best presented thus far out of the replies to fifty-seven questions, but Brother Jenkins' answer amplifies a little on the first part, concerning properties of insulation.

Answer to Question No. 57.

By John Solar, Watertown, N. Y.

The Question:

Tell us why rubber-covered wire is rated so very much lower than weatherproof, and, incidentally, explain to us what "rubber covered" and "weatherproof" insulation consists of, and where each may be used, and why they may be used there. Would it be admissible and desirable to use rubber-covered wire where weatherproof is allowed? How is the strength or quality of insulation determined?

The Answer:

First: Rubber and rubber compounds deteriorate when subjected to heat. Second: In the case of rubber-covered wire ,the covering is in some cases depended on altogether for the requisite insulation, as, for example, where the wires constituting the two sides of a circuit are drawn through a system of conduits. For these reasons the carrying capacity is rated lower than weatherproof, which does not depend entirely on its covering for insulation. Rubber-covered wire for interior work consists of tinned copper wire with a covering of rubber, or rubber compound of homogeneous character, with an outer covering of braided cotton soaked in preservative compound. When a copper wire is covered with any of the rubber compounds, the covering of tin is very important, since the sulphur universally present in rubber insulation is likely to combine with the copper, and in time a small wire would corrode and be entirely destroyed, but for the protection afforded by the tin. There are several ways of testing insulation, the one given here being the test required by the National Board of Fire Underwriters for rubber-covered wire. Any one-foot sample of completed covering must show a dielectric strength sufficient to resist, throughout five consecutive minutes, the application of an electromotive force proportionate to the thickness of the insulation, in accordance with the following table:

Thickness in 64th inches	Breakdown test on 1 foot
1	3,000 volts A. C.
2	6,000 " "
3	9,000 " "
4	11,000 " "
5	13,000 " "
6	15,000 " "
7	16,500 " "
8	18,000 " "
10	21,000 " "
12	23,500 " "
16	28,000 " "

The source of alternating electro-motive force shall be a transformer of at least one kilowatt capacity. The application of the electro-motive force shall be made at 3,000 volts for five minutes, this voltage to be increased by steps of not over 3,000 volts, each raise being held for five minutes, and the increase continued in steps until a rupture of the insulation occurs. The test for dielectric strength shall be made on wire which has been immersed in water for seventy-two hours, one foot of the wire under test is to be submerged in a conducting liquid contained in a metal trough, one of the transformer terminals being connected to the copper of the wire, and the other to the metal of the trough. There are two types of weatherproof wire, viz.: weatherproof and slow-burning weatherproof. The insulation of the slow-burning weatherproof consists of two coatings, one of which, the outer, is fireproof in character, and the other weatherproof. The fireproof coating is on the outside and comprises about six-tenths of the total thickness of the wall. For sizes of wire from No. 14 to 0000 the thickness of the insulation varies from three sixty-fourths to five sixty-fourths of an inch. This wire is not as burnable as weatherproof, nor is it as subject to softening under heat. It is not suitable for outside work, being intended for interior work in dry, warm places, such as shops and factories. There is another type of insulation called "slow-burning," which is still more fireproof than the slow-burning weatherproof. It is intended to be used in very hot places, where ordinary insulation would perish. The insulation of weatherproof wire consists of at least three layers of braid, each of which is thoroughly saturated with a dense, moisture-proof compound, applied in such manner as to drive any atmospheric moisture from the cotton braiding, thus securing a covering to a great degree waterproof, and of high insulating power. The outer surface is slicked down to a hard dense surface. This wire is for use out of doors where moisture is certain, and fireproof qualities are not necessary. In general, weatherproof wire may be used only in those cases where the insulating supports on which the wire is mounted are depended on for insulation, the covering being regarded simply as a precaution against accidental contact with other wires, or any other objects. From the above we can readily see that the principal difference between the rubber covered and other insulations is that the rubber-covered wire may depend entirely on its covering for insulation, while the others must depend largely upon their insulating supports for insulation. Rubber-covered wire may be used in any place where weatherproof would be allowed, but not in places where slow-burning would be required. As rubber-covered wire is more expensive than weatherproof it would not be economical to use it where weatherproof is allowable. So far as the carrying capacity of the copper itself be concerned, it makes no difference what the insulation is composed of.

The first part of Friend Jenkins' reply is as follows:

> Rubber-covered wire is rated lower than weatherproof because current flowing through wire produces a certain rise in temperature, and rubber covering deteriorates at a much lower temperature than does weatherproof insulation, since vulcanized rubber changes its character and becomes brittle when subjected to high temperature and, in consequence thereof, wires so protected must not be allowed to reach a high temperature, particularly not above 140 degrees F. Different methods of rubber insulation are in vogue, but most American manufacturers prefer to use a thin coating of rubber next to the wire. Over this core is placed the second insulating and protecting covering of cotton braid; the outer covering acting merely as a mechanical protection. Chemical mixtures vary, but rubber used for insulating purposes should contain at least 30 per cent., by weight, of dry fine para rubber. The remaining 70 per cent. is usually left to the discretion of the manufacturer. The advantages of rubber-covered wire are: (a) it is waterproof; (b) flexible; (c) fairly strong; (d) its insulating qualities are high.
> Its disadvantages: deteriorates according to the compound used.
> A safe insulation to use for weatherproofing wire would be three coatings of cotton, impregnated with a compound having high moisture resisting qualities, and containing asphaltum. This should be saturated with wax and polished. The advantages of weatherproof insulation are: it is durable, cheap, flexible, and will not deteriorate rapidly unless subjected to high temperature, when it is very apt to puncture under high pressure.

American Carbons.

Michigan contributes the following:

Noticed an article in the department recently, relative to size of spot. I secure perfect results by using a spot 1¾ inches in diameter. I use ½-inch cored carbons below and 5/16-inch cored above on d.c. This may not work so well everywhere, but it is worth a trial.

We have just received a supply of American National carbons which I find to be just as good, if not better, than the imported kind. Have used several makes of imported carbons, but this is my first experience with the Stars and Stripes variety. The only difference I can discover is that with the American carbon the lower carbon beads, or, to put it another way, little beads form around the top of the lower carbon which makes a heavy dust on bottom of lamp house. I cannot understand why the National Carbon Company does not advertise their product. I have been operating for several years, and did not know there was an American projection carbon made until I saw your article in the Moving Picture World. We sent for one hundred, tried them out, and found them to be most excellent, except that the first hundred were only pointed on one end. In ordering the second lot, however, we requested both ends to be pointed and this was done. In sending orders always state whether one or both ends are to be sharpened, and whether you want soft cored or solid. I have a copy of the "Bible" and consult it when in trouble.

With regard to the spot, it must be understood that increasing the size of the spot under given conditions will necessitate a change in the condenser combination, otherwise if you try to increase the size of the spot you will run into trouble in several directions.

As to the National carbon, why it was not available until this trouble came up. The editor of this department, seeing a carbon scarcity looming up, got busy corresponding with the National people, and was, at least in some degree, responsible for getting them to re-enter the projection carbon field. I am more than glad to know that their product is giving satisfaction. The beads you speak of simply show that the carbon is of high-grade material, though if there is very much dust in the bottom of the lamp house it would indicate that the binder is not quite up to the mark. This, however, need not necessarily have an ill effect on the light, but it would cause the carbon to be consumed faster than it ought to be.

Probably Worn Sprocket.

L. L. Stanley, Fremont, Ohio, has trouble as follows:

I have one of your old Handbooks which I have used as a text book for a long time, but am up against something now which I cannot figure out, therefore, I come to you for help. Have been running a Power's Six A for six months and had no trouble at all until recently, but now if there happens to be a loose splice, or a bad spot in the film it seems to catch on the intermittent sprocket and a piece about a foot long rips off the side of the film and wraps about the sprocket, sometimes this occurs on one side, and sometimes on the other.

Your trouble appears to be simple, Brother Stanley. I think there is no question but that it is due to worn sprocket teeth. Using a condenser lens as a magnifier, look at the sprocket teeth and you will find one side badly worn, possibly with a little notch on the base, or maybe worn into a hook shape. The remedy is a new intermittent sprocket. I would also suggest that you are making a great mistake in not getting one of the new Handbooks. If you like the old one you would like the new one ten times better, and relatively the new book is worth more than ten times as much as the old one.

He Understands.

Question No. 53, among other things, asked if it were possible to use copper wire for resistance. The answer published was excellent, but M. W. Larmour, Waco, Texas, sends in a reply which came too late to be considered for publication, and which was not very good on the incandescent end of the question,, but is very complete on the copper rheostat. While, as he says, a copper rheostat is thoroughly impractical, still I believe the following, which is Larmour's reply to part of Question 53, is of sufficient interest to justify its publication.

It is possible to use copper wire for resistance, but not practical for the following reasons: (1) On account of the low resistance of copper it would require such great length of wire to obtain the required resistance as to make the cost prohibitive. (2) The large quantity and weight required would take up so much space and be so hard to handle that its use would be attended with great inconvenience. (3) Copper deteriorates or oxidizes very rapidly when subjected to heat. (4) The resistance of copper wire increases very rapidly as its temperature rises, therefore a rheostat made of it would be very unreliable, or, at least, very hard to handle.

However, if forced to use such a rheostat I would proceed as follows, assuming the voltage to be 110 and the amperage required at the arc to be 45. The arc voltage, that is the voltage required to force the 45 amperes across the arc with the carbons separated the ordinary distance, is about 48 volts, which leaves a surplus of $110 - 48 = 62$ volts to be consumed by the rheostat. To find the ohms resistance required I would divide the voltage by the amperes as $62 \div 45 = 1\ 17/45$. So I would procure enough No. 6 wire (slightly smaller wire could be used, but I would prefer No. 6, as it naturally would not heat as much as a smaller size) which carries from 40 to 65 amperes to offer 1 17/45 ohms resistance, and insert it in series with the arc. One thousand feet of No. 6 B. & S. gauge wire offers .3944 ohms resistance, therefore to get a resistance of 1 17/45 ohms I would proceed as follows: $1\ 17/45 \div .3944 = 3.33 \times 1{,}000 = 3{,}330$ feet of wire required, which will weigh approximately 265 pounds.

Brother Lamour is in error in using No. 6 wire, since its carrying capacity under such conditions would be 65 amperes. No. 8 would be large enough.

A New Projector.

At last the solemn promise of Thomas A. Edison, Incorporated, is about to be fulfilled. The editor recently received a request from Mr. L. W. McChesney, Sales Manager, to come to Orange. In Company with our General Manager, Mr. Wylie, we journeyed to the lair of "The" Edison, and there met the surprise of our innocent young life.

The Edison Company has perfected and, by the time this is in print, will be ready to place on the market their new, improved projector, and you may accept it from me as a fact that the "improved" should be written in italicized capital letters, if there is any such animal. To begin with, the machine is a radical—yes, a very radical departure from all former Edison models. New principles are involved and new methods of doing old things have been brought into play.

The mechanism itself is fully enclosed in a handsomely finished casing, measuring 8½ inches wide by 9½ inches fore and aft, standing 16 inches in height above the table.

The magazines are of heavy, drawn, seamless sheet steel, provided with heavy nickeled spring hinges of special design, both the magazines and the doors thereto being embossed to provide stiffness and to prevent warping.

The tension for the upper reel is provided in a new way, i. e., by means of a coil spring acting on a washer, the effect being to apply friction to the shaft which carries the upper reel, instead of to the reel itself, as was the old way.

Figure 1 is an operating-side view of the mechanism, with the casing removed. Lens tube 1 is mounted in casting 2, inside of which is an adapter ring, so that the lens may be adjusted to any desired position and then clamped firmly in place by tightening thumb screw 3. Thumb screw 4 moves casting 2 forward and backward, thus focusing the lens. Handle 5 controls the gate. By raising it the gate is closed and automatically locked; by lowering it the gate is opened. Handle 5 projects through the casing. This form of gate is, in the opinion of the editor, a most excellent one. It is positive in its action, yet quite convenient.

The aperture plate, 6, is also excellent. You will observe, on either side of the plate, four small screws which hold in place a thin, narrow strip of steel, clamped under which is a very thin, wide strip of spring steel, hard as glass, which furnishes the actual track for the film. This spring steel track may be removed and a new one installed, the operation requiring less than five minutes' time and the cost is merely nominal. The aperture plate is then just as good as it ever was.

At 8, Fig. 1, we see the steel tension shoes, which are acted on by an equalized tension spring controlled by screws 9, which, in the finished model, will have thumb screws for the convenience of the operator.

The machine is what is known as a "straight line machine," in that in threading the film passes straight down past top sprocket 10, aperture plate, 6, intermittent sprocket 11, lower sprocket 12, and into the lower magazine. After all sprocket idlers are closed the film still stretches in a perfectly straight line from magazine to magazine. How the loops are formed will be set forth a little further on.

Framing is accomplished by means of a lever, 13, which connects with roller 14. In order to understand this, imagine the film as stretching down across the three sprockets and aperture as above set forth. At the bottom of the aperture is roller 15. Now, when you raise handle 13 you shove roller 14 in against the film and force it backward against roller 15 and the intermittent sprocket, thus forming a loop, which has the effect of pulling the film further down over the aperture and framing the picture. As to this method of framing I would not like to express any decided opinion until such time as it has been thoroughly tried out, but I will say that I cannot at this time see any earthly reason why it should not work perfectly. By this method the lens is left in absolute and unchanged alignment with the aperture; also there is no interference with the relation of the gears to each other in framing.

The revolving shutter connections are very clearly shown in Fig. 1. Roller 16 and knob 17, Fig. 1, are parts of an automatic control designed to stop the motor and machine in case of (a) broken film, (b) at the end of the film, or (c) in case the take-up should fail to work. It works as follows: When the film is in the machine roller 16 rests against it and is held in an upright position, but should the film break the roller falls forward into the position shown, and by that act breaks the circuit supplying the motor and thus stops the machine. The motor may also be instantly stopped by pressing knob 17.

Looking at top sprocket 10 and lower sprocket 12 you will observe on the end of their hubs knurled knobs x-x. These knobs are of exceeding importance, and something operators are likely to fall in love with instantly. They are small knobs, gentlemen, but they accomplish quite some considerable results, because by pulling outward on either of them the sprocket is released from its shaft and you may turn it either way, thus increasing or decreasing the size of the loop at will. When released the sprocket instantly re-engages with the shaft.

In threading, the film is pulled straight down from upper to lower magazine and the sprocket rollers are all closed. The operator then seizes the knob on the upper or lower sprocket, gives it about half a turn, which sets his loop just right; he then performs the same operation with the other sprocket. This is indeed a very convenient arrangement for the operator.

Another thing in this connection: Looking at the upper sprocket you see a small hole in its end, the same being designed to receive a dowel pin. Opposite on the other end of the sprocket is a second hole, which also contains a dowel pin. The purpose is: When the sprocket teeth become worn on one side, all the operator has to do is to take out the screw in the end of knob x, pull the whole thing off, turn the sprocket end for end, inserting the dowel pins in the holes and replacing the screws, all of which can be done in less than a minute, and provides, in effect, an entirely new set of sprocket teeth.

The intermittent movement of this machine is unique. It is in part, the plain ordinary star and cam movement, hardened and ground, but this is by no means all, and it is in the remainder that we find what seems to be a mighty large-sized proposition. Mr. Gall, technical director of the Motion Picture Department of the Edison Company, has worked out and applied to the star and geneva movement an "accelerator," which has the effect of entering the pin into the star at low speed, rapidly accelerating its speed during the time the film is in movement, and then reducing the speed and removing the pin from the star at low speed. (Remember that in using the terms "high" and "low" speed in this connection we use them relatively only.) The accelerator does not get in its work until the pin is inserted in the slot, thus overcoming the momentum of the star and intermittent sprocket at relatively low speed. I have examined this movement carefully, and cannot see any reason why it won't work perfectly. Mr. Gall informs me that by reason of this accelerator the movement is a true 6 to 1, and a 6 to 1 movement gives, on objectives of ordinary focal length, the ideal 3-wing shutter possibility of 50% light and 50% darkness. As a matter of fact, I saw, and myself projected, a very brilliant light on the screen, with the mechanism running at 60 a minute and no film, and there was absolutely no trace of quiver in the light. The whole intermittent movement runs in an oil bath and I am of the opinion that it is going to make good.

Another thing I must speak of is the very complete cooling arrangement. This can only be partially shown with the casing removed, but as a matter of fact fire shutter 18 is fully an inch away from the film, and in front of the fire shutter is the casing with an auxiliary cooling plate about 3/16 of an inch in front of that, and then another cooling plate still in advance of that.

Figure 2 shows the left hand, or off side, of the mechanism, also with the casing removed. The shutter gears, fly wheel, etc., are very plainly shown, as is also the frame construction. The disassembling of the machine is a very simple matter, since each part is held in place by a screw in the end of its shaft. There isn't a pin in the entire machine, except for the intermittent sprocket which is pinned to its shaft.

Figure 3 is a general view of the assembled machine. Notice the glass in the door of the mechanism case, which gives a view of the entire film track. The reels are special, and have a 4½-inch hub. The take-up mechanism is an improvement on the old type, but the large hub reel is depended upon largely to equalize the tension, it being the only reel that can be used in the lower magazine.

The crank of the machine is of the clutch type. When not in use it disengages itself automatically and hangs straight down, so that it does not interfere with the opening of the machine casing door.

The table is of exceptionally rigid construction, and of unique design. By loosening nuts A - B the whole table may be raised by means of hand-wheel C, or the front may be tilted down or up to any desired angle. As a matter of fact, hand-wheel A provides for an almost micrometer adjustment of the table, since by loosening nut B, keeping nut A tight and working hand-wheel C, the most minute adjustments may be made.

The lamp house is lined with transite board, which, while it radiates heat, is a non-conductor of electricity. There is an air space between the inner and outer walls. The lamp itself has all the modern adjustments, and has them in excellent form.

The condenser casing is ample in proportion and has an efficient spacing arrangement. The lens will be provided with an arrangement to equalize the heat distribution and minimizing or prevent condenser breakage, this being at the suggestion and insistence of the editor.

Figure 4 is a view of the lamp, which requires no comment, except to say that slot 1 is made at such curve that when the lamp is swung in the slot to alter its tilt or angle to the perpendicular, the position of the arc with relation to the center of the condenser remains unchanged.

There are other features of this machine which will be set forth in ample form later. The machine, taken as a whole, is, as I stated in the beginning, a radical departure from former Edison models, and it is, I believe, going to prove a most agreeable surprise for those friends of this company who have stood by them through thick and thin, and they are by no means few either.

A Corker.

George Denniston, Ellsworth, Kansas, says:

> I will show that I don't know it all by asking you to solve the following mystery: We only show evenings, and I work for the light plant during the day. A few days ago the engineer reported the ammeter not working. It was found that by reversing the wires at the ammeter binding post it would work O. K. No more was thought of it at the time, but that evening when I tried to light my projection arc I found it burning upside-down and a test shows the polarity to be changed all over town. The generator is shunt wound, d.c., 25 volt, 400 ampere 280 r.p.m., made by the General Electric Company. There are no other d.c. machines in the vicinity, except the extra one at the station, which was not running at the time. Here is what the engineer says about it: "I looked at the ammeter, which was O. K., went into the ice machine room, which is run by a d.c., 40 h.p. motor. Presently I returned to the engine room and found the ammeter dead; the generator had not been stopped; connections had not been tampered with. The generator is direct connected to the engine."

It seems to me as though the switching of polarity under conditions set forth would be an utter impossibility. In effect you say that the polarity changed while the generator was running, and generating current, and that there was not even a wink in the light, since if there had been the engineer would certainly have noticed it. My own answer to that is: Impossible. I pass this puzzle along to our department electricians, who are invited to see what they can make of it. If the generator had stopped, that would be something else again. My opinion is that the engineer is not telling everything that transpired that night.

Film Cement.

J. B. Hime, Nashville, Tennessee, writes:

> Of course I read the World; not only once, but twice, and have at last grabbed my trusty pen to contribute my mite of information on cement. I use a cement made as follows: Collodion, one ounce; banana oil or bronzing liquid, one ounce; ether one-half ounce. I find this cement to be most satisfactory on all kinds of films except some Pathe hand colored, on which I use a cement composed of one-half acetone and one-half ether. I find it a good scheme to remove the emulsion with sand paper, rather than by scraping, since it is unhealthy to moisten the emulsion with the tongue. Am using a Powers Six A with a new motor drive, which I find to be superior to all other drives I have seen. My picture is 11 feet 4 inches with a 40-foot throw, and it is without flicker. Am using 35 amperes, with ⅝ cored carbon, and my bottom carbon is slightly harder than the top, which, I think, improves the light by 25 per cent. Naturally, I don't "know it all," but this I can say: The more I learn, the bigger fool I think I am, and I have been operating for eight years, during which time I have taken up the art of photography. We are using a Zoller transformer, made in Nashville. It is a very simple device, adjustable to any amperage between 10 and 60 merely by pushing a lever. I would advise operators who are in search of real experience to tackle road work; I have been there myself, and certainly one gets a world of experience in a mighty short time when he "hits the road."

As to the cement, why I pass that along without comment, as I do not know just how that particular formula would work out. It may be excellent. With regard to removing emulsion with sand paper, why quite a number of operators are doing that now. It is easy if rightly done. You are perfectly correct, Brother Hime, in saying that road work is a great educator. By the time Mr. Operator has made a circuit of small towns, and has "got away with it," he is pretty well posted on a good many things. For instance: By the time he has landed in a village at 6 P. M., found the church in which the show is to be given to be without current, or with wires too small to carry the projection current, and a little, dinky transformer up on the pole with a 2,000-volt primary, no platform on which to place his machine, with a blank plaster wall in the other end which the kind pastor says absolutely must not be damaged by a screw hole, and he gets his show on promptly at 8 o'clock and delivers good projection for two hours, why he will probably have learned quite a number of things, and learned them reasonably fast, too. The editor has been there himself and he knows. The new Powers drive is a most excellent device.

Should Have Them Both.

L. M. Lindley, Terre Haute, Indiana, orders a question booklet and says:

> I am a proud owner of the Handbook and a set of Hawkins' Electrical Guide, both of which every one connected with the moving picture theater ought by all means to have. The first peep at these books made me forget their price. Many thanks to Mr. Richardson for his good work.

All of which requires no comment, except to thank the brother for his kind words.

Comments on the Films

THE GIRL OF THE OPEN ROAD (Edison), Dec. 1.—A fair to middling release, second of the "Olive's Opportunities" series, introducing Mabel Trunnelle in the character of the gypsy girl, a crude but wonderfully talented "fiddler," who gets mixed up with and figures in an almost tragedy, involving aristocrats. The photography and scenics effects are the best features of this release. It creates little sensation.

THE BUFFER (Essanay), Dec. 1.—A very interesting story, illustrating how a little motherless son of a very rabid father unconsciously serves as a "buffer" between two opposing factions. It is all very edifying and terminates just as the spectator should wish. Master Rockwell, as Bobby, the buffer, does some very natural acting. Rapley Holmes and Richard C. Travers as the heads of the opposing factions, assisted by a strong cast, make of this a strong offering.

BUD, BILL AND THE WAITER (Kalem), Dec. 1.—A burlesque comedy produced by Marshal Neilan, who made-it-up for Ruth Roland, Lloyd Hamilton and Bud Duncan. This is a dress affair and does not depend on funny clothes for the comedy effects. Although it has an ice cream flavor, it meets with a warm reception, from a laughing point of view, by the audience. This can be recommended as amusing and entertaining.

COUPON COLLECTORS (Lubin), Dec. 1.—Quite a funny little comedy by J. A Murphy, based on the coupon collecting fad. It is burlesque but faithfully illustrates to what extremes people will go to obtain coupons and what useless articles they will select. On the same reel with "For a Widow's Love." Very amusing.

FOR A WIDOW'S LOVE (Lubin), Dec. 1.—On the same reel with "Coupon Collectors." A more than ordinarily pretentious farce comedy, by E. W. Sargent. He involves the charcters in most amusing complications and succeeds in developing a nice little surprise at the finale. The audience enjoyed it immensely.

THE RIVAL STAGE LINES (Selig), Dec. 1.—There is a great amount of action and entailed expense connected with this comedy drama, all of which fails to hit the mark to get over with any great amount of entertaining qualities. Tom Mix and Goldie Colwell are featured. Credit is due to the cameraman, who has beautifully photographed a great amount of roadway through a wild district. The acting is adequate. An average release.

A DOUBLE ELOPEMENT (Edison), Dec. 2.—A very creditable comedy, written by Henry Beldon and produced by Charles M. Seay, with a splendid cast, including Dan Mason, Helen Strickland, Gladys Hulette, Cora Williams and Edward Boulden. While the theme of the plot is not entirely original, it is, nevertheless, provocative of laughter. It possesses scenes bordering on the thrilling at the college, and the termination involves the leading characters in a surprising and comical situation. Enjoyable.

THE FABLE OF THE CLUB GIRLS AND THE FOUR TIME VETERAN (Essanay), Dec. 2.—In this comedy George Ade illustrates how a bachelor maids' club attempts, after a discussion, to demonstrate the different methods of keeping "him home at nights." Numerous theories are expounded but the old time veteran, who has four notches on her hatchet handle, demonstrates that there is no use trying; as her last one, the best of all, was a railroad man, as he was never home. Moral: Absence makes the heart grow accustomed. Full of laughs.

THE LION HUNTER (Selig), Dec. 2.—This visualization entails a love story mixed up with numerous adventures in South Africa. Many wild animals (or supposed to be wild), including elephants, lions, tigers and other jungle beasts are introduced in the cast. Just why the heroine, tied to a tree, could not be scented by the animal actors within a couple of feet of her, looks rather foolish. However, it is somewhat hair-raising. The exceptional jungle scenery is beautifully photographed and the picture is commendable.

THE MYSTERIOUS MR. DAVEY (Vitagraph), Dec. 2.—The author of this comedy, Charles Brown, demonstrates that he thoroughly knows the qualifications of Mr. Sidney Drew, who is featured in this offering, as a comedian. Mr. Drew never lets a chance escape to get a laugh and never forgets the little old funny things that years of experience in the legitimate got over for a good laugh. He invents Mr. Davey, who saves him from much unhappiness in his marital life; but what a narrow escape. A legitimate and most enjoyable comedy.

IN QUEST OF A STORY (Biograph) Dec. 3. An otherwise good story is spoiled in the making. Evidently the shortcomings in this offering are not so much the fault of the actors as the director. There are some interesting moments that are quite appealing and others that crowd more than gently upon the absurd, especially the operation scene, restoring sight to the little blind girl. This release falls considerably short of the Biograph standard, although well produced photographically.

SOPHIE'S FATAL WEDDING (Essanay), Dec. 3.—Another of the many comedies involving the usual characters, Sophie Clutts, Mustang Pete, Slippery Slim and Hiram Clutts. It is the usual contest for the hand of Sophie in which Slim outgenerals Mustang. It gains quite a little laughter.

HEARST-SELIG NEWS PICTORIAL, NO. 80 (Selig), Dec. 3.—A digest of this number will be found on page 1576, issue of Dec. 12, 1914.

THE MAN THAT MIGHT HAVE BEEN (Vitagraph), Dec. 3. Adapted from a magazine story by Rupert Hughes, produced by Wiliam Humphrey, who plays the leading part, supported by Leah Baird, Leo Delaney, Anders Randolf and others. It is a psychological study and the major portion of the visualization exists in the mind of a man who has met with sorrow and lives upon his visions of what might have been. The double exposures and light effects in this picture are marvelous. An interesting study.

MAKING THEM COUGH UP (Biograph), Dec. 4.—A farce comedy showing how a local reformer made the male members of his audience, to whom he was lecturing, fill the contribution basket by threatening to expose the married man he had noticed going into a cabaret with a lady other than his wife. They all contributed liberally. An amusing, well-acted comedy. On the same reel with "Bertha, the Buttonhole Maker."

BERTHA, THE BUTTONHOLE MAKER (Biograph), Dec. 4.—Burlesque on a melodrama. This is more consistent than a great many recently produced by different companies and contains all the realistic effects. On the same reel with "Making Them Cough Up," and is amusing.

THE DEVIL AND MRS. WALKER (Kalem), Dec. 4.—A farcical comedy of a domestic nature, wherein two families, next door neighbors have an awful time attempting to prevent the daughter of one and the son of the other staying on their own side of the fence. Mrs. Walker is a shrew, but the way her henpecked husband finally convinces her that she is wrong, is very amusing to see. John E. Brennan is the special feature.

A BELIEVER IN DREAMS (Lubin), Dec. 4.—This might be considered a double-barreled release, jumping back from the present time to swashbuckling days, where it repeats itself in the dream of a very vacillating young lady. It is quite sumptuous in setting and costumes. There is very little of real interest in the story to the average spectator, but the picture has been beautifully made, in all details, and the photography and light effects are magnificent.

WHICH HAM IS SCHNAPPSMEIER'S (Selig), Dec. 4.—A farce that is far more boisterous in its action than anything else. There is a great amount of extraordinary effort on the part of the actors which gets little appreciation; it is more foolish than funny. On the same reel with "Love's Acid Test."

LOVE'S ACID TEST (Selig), Dec. 4.—The little interest that obtains in this offering is based on a mistake a druggist makes compounding a prescription. The mistake enables the family to pay their rent to an obdurate landlord; which is something anyway. On the same reel with "Which Ham is Schnappsmeier's?"

THE METHODS OF MARGARET (Vitagraph), Dec. 4.—While this is not an uproarous comedy picture it is very pleasing and satisfying. Lillian Walker is the young wife who uses a very original method, of an ingenious type, to break her husband of the feminitis habit in the selection of his employees. It is a splendidly acted and legitimate comedy, containing many scenes of merit, photographicaly. Arthur H. Ashley is quite and natural in his character of the husband. Mrs. Ray Long, the author, and Wilfred North, director, deserves credit. This number will entertain any audience.

THE DEACON'S SON (Biograph), Dec. 5.—This one-reel drama is very touching in a number of its scenes and Lew Hart makes of the deacon, an iron willed, sanctimonious old father, a very human (or rather inhuman) character. Hector V. Sarno and Vivian Prescott do excellent work. In the finale the deacon heaps the ashes of remorse upon his own head, as a result of his harsh selfishness. This is a very commendable release in all respects.

IT'S A BEAR (Edison), Dec. 5.—A comedy by Harry G. Bates. The theme of this plot is afflicted with familiarity and it does not cut any great figure as a laugh maker. Ridiculous scenes ruin the few laughable ones that occur, although the cast contains names familiar as leading people in the Edison's stock. It is received with very mild appreciation.

BRONCHO BILLY'S JUDGMENT (Essanay), Dec. 5.—Broncho Billy, western drama, which has a strong love theme. It contains the usual clearly photographed rough and ready western scenes, and the plot is intense. The acting is well done by all in the cast. It fills the bill nicely.

THE STOLEN ENGINE (Kalem), Dec. 5.—Fourth of the "Hazards of Helen" series. This picture has been reviewed at length in the Moving Picture World and can be found on page 1243, issue of Nov. 28, 1914.

BROWN'S COOK (Lubin), Dec. 5. A farce comedy by E. W. Sargent, involving two families, husbands, wives and cooks in a general domestic mix-up, in which each one thinks they are getting the worst of it. It is very vigorous in nature but gets over for hearty laughs. On the same reel with "He Wanted His Pants."

HE WANTED HIS PANTS (Lubin), Dec. 5 Another Sargent comedy, illustrating how a wife gets the best of her husband in the usual old familiar way, by getting up first in the morning. It is very amusing to see the methods he takes to recover his missing pantaloons; he comes out second best. On the same reel with "Brown's Cook."

HER SISTER (Selig), Dec. 5.—A dramatic picture written by Gilson Willets. It contains many emotional scenes which are well acted. The story of the plot is not a very pleasant one but it is gratifying to see how in the final scene the scoundrel who is the cause of all the sorrow meets with a just end for his duplicity. The interiors and exteriors are adequate, the acting is excellent and the photography is up to the standard. It is an average production.

BUSTER BROWN CAUSES A COMMOTION (Edison), Dec. 7.—Buster, Mary Jane, Tige and Tommy proceeds to get into their usual amount of trouble—this time with sneezing powder, which they surreptitiously supply to Grandpa Brown, mamma, the maid, the cook, and the goat; over which Buster has a grandglorious dream and almost frightens Tige out of bed.

JUST A KID (Biograph), Dec. 7.—A drama which contains in its scenes considerable that is of interest, but the why and the wherefore element seems to have been left to the imagination of the spectator. While there are some few heart touching scenes, there is a lack of convincing quality. Why was the tramp, and where did he come from, who was he and where did he escape to and why was he allowed to escape?—after he had set fire to the barn. "Just a Kid" is an excellent title for this picture, for that is about all it amounts to. Credit is due the acting and photography.

CRYSTALS—THEIR MAKING, HABITS AND BEAUTY (Edison), Dec. 7.—An educational of the utmost interest. A youthful chemist is shown experimenting, in the kitchen of his home, producing crystals under his microscope, with such simple mineral substances as table salt, epsom salts, gunpowder, azo-benzol, toluene nitrate and other compounds. To the unintitated in chemistry this is a revelation, demonstrating that the laws of nature are beyond the reach of art.

SWEEDIE AND THE HYPNOTIST (Essanay), Dec. 7.—A picture comedy in which many laughs are engendered, from the fact that Sweedie, scrub lady in the theater, has succumbed to the powers of a hypnotist. Under his influence, the film shows, what she imagines while in an unconscious state. Some very strange and amusing situations occur in which a goat cuts a great figure and awakens Sweedie, destroying her ideals. This is a most laughable number.

HEARST-SELIG NEWS PICTORIAL NO. 81 (Selig) Dec. 7. United States soldiers returning from Mexico, embarking on transports, also landing later at Fort Crockett, where they are affected by the cold after leaving a warm climate; Secretary Bryan and diplomats from various states, joining in prayer for peace on Thanksgiving Day; various views of Cardinal Gibbons. War scenes: Bengalese soldiers demonstrating their expertness in sabre exercises; the wreck of the steamer Hanalei on the California coast, twelve miles from San Francisco, showing the life saving crew rescuing passengers and crew from the surf; many scenes of the army and navy football game in which the army was victorious 20 to 0.

THE MOONSHINE MAID AND THE MAN (Vitagraph), Dec. 7.—Written and produced by Charles L. Gaskill featuring Helen Gardner, supported by Ned Finley, Rex Hitchcock and John Costello in the leading characters. It is a story of the moonshiners with the scenes laid in the mountains. It is quite thrilling and very melodramatic, with some emotional scenes. The acting is well done, also the photography. It will please those who appreciate sensation.

Licensed Specials

SAVED FROM A LIFE OF CRIME (Vitagraph), Dec. 1.—A special feature in two parts, which might be considered questionable as an entertainer, especially to the younger element. The author is H. A. Boger and Theodore Marston is the director. James Morrison gives a splendid rendition as a lawless street waif, afterward a hero. It is well produced and acted in every respect and claims to contain a moral, showing that we are all creatures of circumstances and opportunities. Let us hope it will fulfil the mission. It is very thrilling in its action.

THE CLOSING WEB (Biograph), Dec. 1.—A two-part story that is replete with morbidness throughout the two reels. It is composed of a series of incidental happenings in an atmosphere that is not conducive to moral health, although devoid of suggestiveness. Louise Vale sustains a thankless character and, indeed the whole cast do creditable work. The scenic qualities are adequate and the photography and costuming are first-class. It is moderately interesting.

THE PRODIGAL (Kalem), Dec. 2.—A modern two-act picture drama, featuring Tom Moore and Marguerite Courtot. It is a very pretty story, demonstrating how a young man, who is accustomed to associating with a city swift set, becomes enamored with a simple country girl, whom he accidentally meets, and eventually makes his wife, to the chagrin of an adventuress. There are some rather swift scenes conducive to the plot, which are pardonable. Miss Courtot makes of Violet, the country girl, a very sweet and sympathetic character. This number can easily be classed as most interesting by serious observers.

THE HOUSE OF D'OR (Lubin), Dec. 2.—A two-part special release written by Marc Edmund Jones and produced by Paul M. Powell. There is a great deal of plot crowded into the two reels—so much that at times it is not thoroughly comprehensive. The acting is very well done, especially on the part of W. E. Parsons. Some quite good stock market scenes are shown, but the photography is hardly up to the standard in places. Some of the characters seem to have forgotten that a lapse of a number of years require a change of costume and some little appearange of aging.

THE GRIP OF THE PAST (Lubin), Dec. 3.—A two-reel picture play by Shannon Fife and produced by Joseph Smiley, who also plays a prominent part in the cast. Justina Huff, Lilie Leslie, John Smiley, William Cohill, Eleanor Blanchard and James J. Cassidy, others in the cast, labor hard to instill interest into this release, which outside of the acting and photography is not productive of a great amount of merit. A very ordinary release.

WHO GOES THERE (Edison), Dec. 4.—As the caption would imply this is a two-reel adaption of H. A. Du Souchet's famous military play in which Walter E. Perkins starred as "Toppy." He is also featured in the same character in this picture release, supported by a large cast, made up of leading Edison players. It is full of legitimately funny situations. It is received with continuous laughter and fully deserves all it gets.

THE PLACE, THE TIME AND THE MAN (Essanay), Dec. 4.—A picture drama in two parts, adapted from a Munsey Magazine story, showing the desperate means that the controlling element of competing railroads will adopt to get the upper hand. It is a very interesting story containing quite a number of thrills. Richard C. Travers, Rapley Holmes, Thomas Commerford and Gerda Holmes, assisted by a strong cast, make of this release one of remarkable strength. It is much above the average.

BUNNY'S LITTLE BROTHER (Vitagraph), Dec. 5.—A special feature comedy in two parts, written by J. Dwiggins, who also plays the part of the little brother. George D. Baker, who directed the able cast, made up of John Bunny, Flora Finch, Jay Dwiggins and Edwina Robbins, assisted by other clever actors, make of this release an exceptional fun producer. The audience seemed to be sorry when it was all over.

THE PRICE OF SILENCE (Kalem), Dec. 7.—A two-act modern drama of the Alice Joyce series, which is a melodramatic production that reminds one of the old Al. Wood mill girl one night stands. The author is Louis B. Gardner and the producer Kenean Buel. The cast is a good one and all labor hard in their respective parts. The scenic effects and photography are up to the mark. As a two-part picture feature it creates mild interest.

THE MYSTERY OF THE SEVEN CHESTS (Selig), Dec. 7.—A two reel feature written by James Oliver Curwood—a mystery story, which easily holds attention. The cast is a good one, embracing Adda Gleason, Lillian Hayward, Wm. Stowell and Edwin Wallock in the leading parts. There are beautiful scenes on land and sea, which are well photographed. After many thrilling adventures the heroine is instrumental in releasing her father from prison and all ends satisfactorily. A strong release.

Independent

MARY GREEN'S HUSBAND (Universal Ike), Oct. 13.—This story, written by Grace Cunard, shows how a young drummer marries a waitress in a restaurant, who has fallen heir to a mining claim, in order to keep some schemers from victimizing her. There is some unconscious humor in this, as many observers will think the drummer had a pretty strong motive besides love. However, the story is quite entertaining and well photographed.

ANIMATED WEEKLY, NO 143 (Universal), Dec. 2. War pictures, state celebrations, the Army-Navy football game and pictures of Richard Croker and his Indian bride lead the interest in this pleasing number.

SHOTGUNS THAT KICK (Keystone), Dec. 3.—Runs, tumbles and kicks of one kind in the shoulder and of another in the back and some wonderful shooting of hats from one head to another make the backbone of this picture. Part of it is very funny, part is only vulgar.

THE CREATOR OF HUNGER (Princess), Dec. 4.—An entertaining comedy-drama, with Boyd Marshal and Mayre Hall in the leads. The artist paints a picture of a poor girl and her father, which he calls "Hunger." A rival artist steals the painting and wins a prize at the exhibition, but the truth comes out at last. A familiar type of plot dressed up in entertaining style and nicely pictured.

GETTING ACQUAINTED (Keystone,) Dec. 5.—Mabel Normand, Charles Chaplin and others are undeniably comical in this lively farce.

MR. HADLEY'S UNCLE (Komic), Dec. 6.—In the "Bill" series this is a very funny picture and a good offering.

THE AMATEUR DETECTIVES (Thanhouser), Dec. 6.—Another of the familiar black hand comedies, in which the girl and hero alarm the household with mystic symbols and then turn detectives and earn the reward. The plot is only a trifle, but the cast is pleasing and the photography good.

OUR MUTUAL GIRL, NO. 47 (Reliance), Dec. 7.—In this number Margaret meets Douglas Fairbanks, the actor, then attends the football game between Princeton and Yale. The views of the grounds, buildings and the game itself are very fine. This makes a good number, though there is no plot with it.

OTHER PEOPLE'S BUSINESS (Keystone), Dec. 7.—Has much of the usual quality and can hardly help amusing the many. It also has some of the old stunts, like pie-throwing, kicking in that part of one's anatomy that seems to offer itself and other things of the kind.

LIMPING TO HAPPINESS (Beauty), Dec. 8.—A pleasing comedy number, in which the lovers quarrel at a dance. Next day both pretend to be lame and visit the doctor's office at the same time. The little girl also pretends lameness and brings the lovers together. The photography is good and the offering makes attractive light comedy.

HER BRAVE HERO (Majestic), Dec. 8.—A lively domestic comedy with "Baldy" Belmont as the sporty family man. He pours sleeping powders in the booze, putting his wife, the hired girl and her policeman friend to sleep; he himself finally falls a victim to the potion. This is put on in lively style, is well photographed and enjoyable.

THE FOREST THIEVES (Reliance), Dec. 9.—A good out-door number, in which the hero is a young forest ranger. He discovers a plot between the millionaire and the forest supervisor to get control of a large tract of timber land. The girl postmistress is the heroine. The plot is not powerful, but the scenes are attractive and the photography excellent.

THE GIRL IN QUESTION (American), Dec. 9.—A fine comedy number with Wm. Garwood and Vivian Rich as the young couple. Louise Lester does a fine bit of acting in the part of the mother, who makes a sport of herself in order to shame the erring son. The photography is excellent and the film an enjoyable offering.

THE PLUMBER (Keystone), Dec. 10.—This is a very funny picture, and though it has a little touch of what some will term vulgar, it is so comical that most will count it a very praisworthy offering.

IN WILDMAN'S LAND (Majestic), Dec. 11.—A young couple traveling in an auto with their child stop in a wild region. The wife has a dream which is pictured with decided realism; in this the child is stolen by wild creatures who live in a cave. The scenes are picturesque and well-photographed.

PERCY THE MILLINER (Royal), Dec. 12.—This comedy of a flirtatious male milliner is well-pictured and contains considerable amusement. Percy follows the woman to her home and when the husband appears is forced to stand out on the porch in the rain. This is quite pleasing.

HER HIGHER AMBITION (Frontier), Dec. 12.—The first part of this reel, picturing the ambitions of a stage-struck girl, gets a good hold on the interest. The closing scenes were not as strong as the story promised. The cast and photography are pleasing.

THE MOUNTAIN TRAITOR (Eclair), Dec. 13.—A story of a mountain district where an illicit still is operated by the Girl's father. The hero overhears a plot to arrest the father and goes to the still, where he is taken by the villain's accomplices. The girl saves him at the trial. This is handled with a fair degree of interest, but has no particular originality of plot. An average offering.

THE RURAL DEMONS (L-KO), Dec. 13.—Billy Ritchie and H. Pathe Lehrmann appear in this as eccentric rube characters on a farm. Gertrude Selby is the girl. The action is the usual knockabout sort. The egg throwing was not an attractive feature. Sandwiched into this are a number of scenes showing how automobile tires are made. This would have been an excellent half reel feature by itself, and is very interesting as it stands. The photography was not very clear in places.

LIZZIE'S FORTUNE (Sterling), Dec. 14.—The girl in the boarding house finds her stock rising when a letter arrives saying she has inherited $5,000. Three boarders try for her hand, but it develops dater she is to get nothing. A familiar plot, full of action and carrying the interest quite well. The photography is uneven but generally good.

SUCH A MISTAKE (Crystal), Dec. 15.—Charley and Vivian quarrel and, to make each other jealous, she flirts with the butler and he with the maid. Trouble follows, and they compromise by hiring colored help. This makes fair comedy.

THE GLASS PISTOL (Crystal), Dec. 15.—On same reel with above. A tramp takes a toy glass revolver from some boys and holds up numerous people. There is also a love story in this. The plot is not strong and this is only moderately interesting.

HOW FATHER WON OUT (Joker), Dec. 16.—A burlesque comedy number in which Ernest Shield plays the part of a cadet at military school. He falls in love with a waitress and his father comes to investigate; the father marries the girl himself. This is well-pictured and has some amusing eccentric humor in it.

THE FATAL HANSOM (Sterling), Dec. 17.—Wm. Wolbert appears in this as Noodles, a cab driver. He and another are rivals for a girl. The most amusing situations are toward the latter part of the reel where Noodles backs the hansom off the pier. Eccentric comedy somewhat better than the average.

WITHIN THE GATES OF PARADISE (Imp), Dec. 17.—A Christmas story in which the poor man and his children invade a rich home on Christmas eve, the former to rob the house and the latter to see the tree. The situation is none too convincing, but the Christmas tree and the Christmas spirit are there and the picture serves its purpose quite well.

HIS DOG-GONE LUCK (Nestor), Dec. 18.—A comedy number in which Eddie Lyons appears as the young boarder in love with the landlady's daughter. He cannot pay his board, but hides the landlady's dog and then proceeds to find it again, which puts him in high favor with her. A lightly amusing comedy number with an agreeable cast.

HERE AND THERE IN CHINA WITH HOMER CREY (Nestor).—An educational picture on same reel.

HIS DOCTOR'S ORDERS (Joker), Dec. 19.—A comedy number with considerable snap to it. Wm. Franey appears as a husband who wants to get away when his mother-in-law is coming. He conspires with his pal, the doctor, and they go to the beach. The wife and mother follow. This part is familiar, but the closing scenes are new and amusing.

TWO KISSES (Royal), Dec. 19.—A farce that will depend on the willingness of the spectator to laugh and enjoy it. It is rough and, while the idea is new, much of the business is old and some of it a bit worn. In rough localities it will surely go well.

THE JEWEL OF ALLAH (Eclair), Dec. 20.—A mystic story of the Hindus, better presented than usual. The jewel of Allah is taken from a meteor, which falls in India. It has power to cure blindness. Later in America the father of the blind girl steals the stone. Her sight is restored and the father's life saved when he explains. A good example of the mystic type of story. The photography is good.

THE BARON'S BEAR ESCAPE (L-KO), Dec. 20.—A hunting yarn chiefly interesting for its good photography and fine scenic effects. Henry Bergman is enjoyable as the baron, but the plot of having the lover disguise as a bear has been used so often that it lacks freshness. A familiar subject well presented.

THE CHASER (Warner's).—A split reel with two very rough offerings. The "chaser" is what a couple of tramps get when they try to achieve a free drink of whiskey. Luna Company made the reel.

HIS NEIGHBOR'S PANTS (Warner's).—There is a bit more roughness than usual in this offering; it might give offense in a high-toned house.

THE WHITE PIRATE (Warner's).—An extravaganza that will appeal to all kinds of audiences. It has enough in it that's new and in itself comical to go well at any time. It was made by the Starlight Company and we count it a good entertaining offering.

TWO SMARTIES (Warner's).—These comic offerings made for commercial use may serve very well indeed in the right house at the right time. This has no special appeal; in some places it might go well, in others not at all. It's a Superba offering.

THE MAN IN SKIRTS (Warner's).—A nonsense farce a la Keystone made by the Superba Company and featuring Charlie De Forest. It is very rough and with a rough audience in the right mood will doubtless prove a roar and a scream.

HER BIRTHDAY PRESENT (Warner's).—A tragic story, the germ of which has served for many offerings before this. This version is well acted; but the story is not convincing and is very unpleasant. The woman's husband has the keeping over night of a roll of bills (a bit obscure here). He takes them to his wife as her birthday present. That night he tries to rob the house of them but, being in disguise, is shot dead. Made by the Premier Company.

DR. KILLEM'S DOPE (Warner's).—A nonsense farce to make fun; there is no plot. It is a Premier picture and a bit rough in its action.

PUSS IN THE WELL (Warner's).—A child picture made by the Starlight Company. It is a melodrama, such as a child might dream, and played by children; but it is dreamed by the mother of a little girl, Puss, who is giving a party in the next room. The kiddies are attractive; but the story doesn't get over strongly.

THE RUNAWAY LEOPARD (Pathe).—This comic is a reprint of a picture released some two or three years ago. We reviewed it at that time. It is very laughable and was decidedly popular. A good light offering.

Independent Specials.

THE MILL STREAM (Imp), Dec. 14.—A two-reel story with an extremely picturesque setting along a mill stream. King Baggot plays the young miller, in love with the girl. The young stranger appears and is taken into partnership. He also falls in love with the girl and trifles with her affections. The partner is killed and Jack is found guilty of the crime, but later the girl discovers the body of a tramp in the lake and finds evidence that he was the murderer. The fine photography and artistic setting do much to make this an attractive offering. The cast is also pleasing, Arline Pretty and Robert Hill being among the principals.

THE GHOST OF SMILING JIM (Gold Seal), Dec. 17.—A two-reel Western story, with Francis Ford and Grace Cunard in the leading roles. The latter doubles as mother and daughter. The first reel, in which Jim's claim is jumped and he loses his memory from a fall, is the strongest of the two. The girl's recognition of her father and the recovery of his memory in the second reel was obvious, though there is considerable satisfaction in the closing scenes where the gambler and his family are forced to disgorge their illegal holdings. A Western number of average merit.

AMBITION (Rex), Dec. 17.—A pleasing two-reel subject depicting the age-old struggle between art and home life. The young wife marries a struggling artist; later, her longing to return to the stage becomes irresistible and she leaves both him and her child. The child dies while she is playing. The crazed husband rushes to the theater and goes upon the stage during a performance, where he denounces her. Later her love for him returns and the picture ends happily. While this covers familiar ground, the plot is, nevertheless, strongly handled and the production is well above the average. Ben Wilson and Frances Nelson have the leads, doing very capable work. The photography is good. A strong offering.

A GAME OF WITS (Eclair), Dec. 18.—An entertaining and well-pictured story of international intrigue. Carol Holoway plays the part of Donna Inez, a Mexican adventuress. She lures the secretary of the American ambassador down to Mexico City, but the secret service detective for the American government intercepts her scheme to obtain the papers by some clever work. This is a fascinating subject and holds the interest closely through the entire two reels. Fred Sumner, E. Redmond and Ernest Evers have important roles. The Mexican settings are picturesque.

A PAGE FROM LIFE (Rex), Dec. 20.—A two-reel crook story, with Herbert Rawlinson, Frank Lloyd, Wm. Worthington and Anna Little in the cast. The story, written and produced by Frank Lloyd, is full of action and holds the interest. The author-producer plays the crook, Breen, who makes a tool of the girl's crippled father. They live in the best society, supported by the father's forgeries, which are unknown to the girl. Later, she learns the bitter truth and joins forces with Richard, her lover, in an effort to free her father from his evil affiliations. The photography is good and the offering a good one for its type.

ZUDORA, NO. 4 (The Haunted Hills—Thanhouser).—The story (two reels) is surely not convincing; but before the spectre of the hills is explained there is a sense of mystery. Good staging and able acting help the picture as an offering.

WHO SHOT BUD WALTON (Reliance), Dec. 5.—A two-part offering with rough western characters. The innkeeper's daughter is the heroine and is loved by two cowboys. Her preference is Slim, a mild-tempered man, but Walton tries to force her to accept him. Slim is with her in a room next to the bar room. Walton, with his gang, comes to the saloon to carry away the girl. Slim had just been wounded by Walton and though he has his rifle with him, can't fire it. The girl takes it, aims and kills the villain. The sheriff can't, at first, make out who did the shooting. The picture is a carefully directed offering and, although the first part of it is a bit confusing, it holds well as soon as the story gets under way.

A QUESTION OF COURAGE (Majestic), Dec. 6.—A two-part picture with a very striking theme. A mother dopes the coffee of her soldier son that he might not go to the battle and be killed; she had lost her two oldest sons fighting for the Union. The son is, of course, arrested and tried for desertion, but never admits that his delay was due to his mother's fault. General Grant, stopping at the soldier's house to get refreshment, hears of the incident from the servant and rides on. He comes to headquarters while the court martial is on, and it is he who says that the courage of the lad's refusing to implicate his mother was greater than the courage of battle and reverses the court's finding. The acting of the old mother is full of life and it gives to the offering a high place among pictures.

OUT OF DARKNESS (American), Dec. 7.—A two-reel picture dealing with two ex-convicts. The one who determined to lead a straight life falls in love with the daughter of the other. The climax comes when the older ex-convict, still a reprobate, but keeping himself hidden from his family, finds, immediately after he has stolen money in the other's keeping, that he and the daughter are sweethearts. Conscience-stricken, he returns it and is shot. There is reconciliation and the old man dies. It is a pretty well acted picture and makes a fair offering.

THE READER OF MINDS (Thanhouser), Dec. 8.—A unique plot is brought out in this very interesting two-reel number, written by Philip Lonergan. Two inventions are introduced, one a machine for blowing up battleships at a distance and the other an instrument for reading minds. The villain steals the hero's idea by means of the latter, but the girl at the telephone switchboard learns the truth and aids in recovering the plans. This is well photographed and presented in a fresh, entertaining manner.

THE PANTHER (Broncho), Dec. 16.—A strong two-reel offering of the Canadian woods, with Walter Edwards appearing as the brutal factor known as the panther. The story is almost savage in its intensity, and this could have been toned down somewhat without injuring its strength. Yet it is a picture of the open country where flogging, fighting and killing are expected. An appealing love story is interpolated, Louise Glaum being the girl and Frank Borzage the young man. The scenes are in keeping with the rugged character of the tale. A strongly dramatic offering.

A POLITICAL FEUD (Domino), Dec. 17.—The first reel of this two-part picture of political life in the Middle West deals with the boyhood of two men who are to be rivals for the governorship of the State and fails to convince strongly. College life is one of the weak places in pictures—so seldom does a producer get the right atmosphere. Yet this picture draws college life as do others, and spectators who do not know the real atmosphere may accept it as all right. In the second reel there are fine situations and they have been developed with originality and effectiveness. T. H. Ince and R. V. Spencer are responsible for story and production. The players go well.

A TEMPERAMENTAL WHIFFLES (Pathe).—A good two-reel farcical offering. It escapes the bane of too many of our American farces, which is the practical joke. It is light and keeps the comic spirit. A very fair offering.

RUTH ROLAND GOES TO BALBOA.

Ruth Roland, esteemed by millions of theatergoers throughout the world, has signed a three-year contract with the Balboa Amusement Producing Company of Long Beach, Cal., and will be the star leading woman of one of the corporation's mammoth dramatic companies, her engagement following closely upon that made with Henry B. Walthall.

Miss Roland was born in San Francisco August 21, 1893. At the age of four years she made her theatrical debut by appearing as the mascot in "Cinderella," a song and dance specialty. Later she enacted child's parts with the Ed. Holden stock company. She then was in vaudeville for a time with the Broadway Trio, the organization making an extended tour of the Eastern cities. Finally, after returning to San Francisco, Miss Roland was featured in Morosco and Belasco productions as a child actress, enacting roles in "Uncle Tom's Cabin," "The Ensign," "Bootles's Baby," and many other plays. She next had two years' work on the Orpheum circuit, being featured as "Baby Ruth," following which her mother took her to Honolulu, where she appeared at the leading theater for six months.

After returning to California she enacted for many months the star role of "Little Lord Fauntleroy." After a season in vaudeville she attended school in Los Angeles until she was sixteen years of age. After leaving school she enacted important roles in a stock company, worked for a time in vaudeville and then joined the Kalem moving picture company's players, where she remained four years.

Miss Roland's engagement with the Balboa Company is, in a way, a return by her to her work as a dramatic player. Her youth, beauty, genius, talents and long experience as a star in the picture art will all contribute to her forthcoming triumphs as a feature player for the Balboa films.

NOVEL ADVERTISING STUNT AT BOSTON BALL.

One of Sawyer's livest zone offices is the Phoenix Film Corporation, of 129 Columbus avenue, Boston, Mass, which handles all the New England States for that popular brand. Wednesday, December 2d, was the date of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Ball at the Boston Arena. The Phoenix people distributed several thousand toy balloons in the shape of footballs, and printed "Kick-in with Sawyer" on the side. These souvenirs were distributed inflated with gas, and soon after the opening the box was almost mobbed by those anxious to secure them. Soon the crowd began to throw them in the air and hit them, and when the various spotlights hit them they became specially prominent. It was by far the best advertising stunt pulled off at the affair, the second best being the work of the same company, who gave away ten thousand paper hats bearing the inscription "Cecil Spooner in 'Nell of the Circus.' Another Sawyer Hit. Get it from Phoenix."

Edeson-Mitchell-Hart.

A TRI-STAR combination is soon to be offered the public by Thomas H. Ince, general manager of the New York Motion Picture Corporation. It will consist of Robert Edeson, William S. Hart and Rhea Mitchell and will find its way to the screen through the new production, entitled "On the Night Stage."

Robert Edeson.

In its theme the story is powerful an uncommon element in the average western play, and its big scenes grant Edeson, Hart and Miss Mitchell plenty of opportunity to grip an audience. It is the mere narrative of an athletic parson's arrival in a western village and his subsequent fascination for a dance-hall girl. There is the other man and the marriage, but it is in the manly acquaintance, which in spite of the rivalry ripens with time, that the story has its strength.

Mr. Edeson declared himself as being delighted with the role assigned him, while Mr. Hart's theatrical success in a large measure has been due to his fondness for western characters.

W. S. Hart.

Both of the distinguished actors found, they said, in Miss Mitchell a wonderfully accomplished leading woman and her ready grasp of the dramatic situations was the object of their profound admiration. With the completion of the production Mr. Edeson departed the studios—his contract expired—but Mr. Hart remained to be starred alone in "The Bargain," a five-part feature now being released by Paramount. Finishing "The Bargain," Mr. Hart signed permanently with Mr. Ince and is now acting in and directing productions at Inceville.

UNCLE SAM LOANS UNIVERSAL A SUBMARINE.

An especially timely photoplay is "The Submarine Spy," a two-reel naval drama, re-issued under the Imp brand, to be released on Monday, December 28. Trapped 150 feet beneath the ocean, the last dying struggles of a submarine crew and officers make as startling a "thriller" as any one-act play ever put on at the Petit Guignol theater in Paris. Uncle Sam loaned a real submarine to the Universal for the taking of this picture and the result is a war film which should make a special appeal to Americans in view of the great European war.

Stefansson Expedition Pictures

Rescue of Survivors on Wrangle Island Produced by the Sunset Motion Picture Company.

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

THE fate of the famous arctic explorer Stefansson is unknown. These pictures give us the last glimpse of the man as he was seen among the living. He has struck out on a desperate venture with no companion but a native and with heroic courage, braving the deadly wilderness of drifting ice. Perhaps his pluck and resourcefulness are keeping him alive against the day of final rescue, perhaps he has been claimed as a victim by the hostile elements.

With this strange uncertainty surrounding the hero of these films it ought to be easy to the publicity man to draw the public attention. M. E. Cory, of San Francisco, who controls these pictures, has wisely sacrificed many thousands of feet taken on the expedition of rescue which brought the little vessel "King and Wing" to the farthest North. The result is that this picture is almost free from the great bane of similar pictures taken in the past. The photography is uniformly good, none of the scenes are ever permitted to wear out their welcome on the screen by being prolonged beyond their actual general interest, there are no stretches of wintry photography and there is no emphasizing the general bleakness of the North.

There are about eight thousand feet of this feature and it would be difficult to cut out more than a hundred or two without depriving the spectator of some real enpoyment. There is real variety and, what is in films of this nature particularly valuable, there are touches of humor and of that pathos which makes the whole world kin.

It would be utterly impossible to treat the subject in a hasty review like this, which must needs content itself with skimming along the surface. A few of the more conspicuous merits of the production may, however, be pointed out. The contrast between Alaska and Siberia is very finely brought out. The American frozen North we are glad to see is quite different from the Russian. The aboriginal natives of Alaska are more intelligent, more susceptible to civilizing influence and represent an altogether better type of humanity than the Siberian natives. Climatic conditions are responsible for this fact to some extent, but the pictures make it plain that the free democratic spirit of America had something to do with it, too. The autocratic bearing of the Russian officials, their haughty demeanor toward their perhaps more useful inferiors and all the red tape of Russian officialdom are well brought out on the screen and make a striking contrast to the plain efficiency of the American manner of doing things. There is an undersized but pompous Russian official in one or two scenes and he is sure of a good many laughs.

The life of the natives is well portrayed and never even approaches the borderland of the tedious. The human touches and the swift changes in the scenes have taken care of that. The camera man has generally avoided the beaten paths and, with but few exceptions, we get nothing but what is altogether new. The animal life is well described, too, but it does not predominate unduly and there are but few repetitions of familiar scenes.

The dramatic interest in the films is naturally great in view of what I said above. The rescue of two camps of the survivors of the Stefansson expedition is gripping in its pathetic interest. Tragic moments are not lacking—in an unusually skillful fashion the cameraman shows the results of sufferings in the arctic ocean upon the human body and the human mind. In one of the camps the rescue came at the moment when all hope had been abandoned by the survivors. The poor men had become so dejected and pathetic that they waited for days before burying their companions who had succumbed to cold and hunger. Their choicest dish was soup made from boiled skins when the rescuing party arrived. The distress in the second of the rescued camps was not quite so severe; they had a native Eskimo hunter with them, the remains of a seal and nine good cartridges. Their joy at being relieved was however none the less keen.

I can see a distinct advance in the making of arctic pictures. This film has very largely profited by the mistakes and experiences of the past. These reels make the evening go by pleasantly and what educational value they have is incidental rather than obtrusive. The films are well titled. They may be presented without a lecture, but a lecture will undoubtedly add to their entertainment value. There is so much of interest connected with almost every scene that the explanation will be listened to with attention. The delight will be for the ear as well as for the eye.

Thomas H. Davison

London Film Man Takes With Him Sole English Agency for Kinetophote Productions.

AFTER three weeks in New York, Thomas H. Davison sailed on December 4 for England. Mr. Davison is known to the English exhibitors as the whole thing in Davison's Film Sales Agency of London, with offices at 151-3 Wardour street. He represents in England the British and Colonial Kinematograph Company, Martins' Film, the Lion's Head Brand (Cricks & Martin), the Industrial and Educational, and also the Tressagraph Company. Mr. Davison is taking back with him the sole English agency for Kinetophote productions. He also sold while here the American rights for a big subject by a famous author and a "Long Way to Tipperary," produced by the British and Colonial.

Thomas H. Davison.

Mr. Davison was for many years general manager for B. Nichols of the M. P. Sales Agency, who handles the American Biograph, the Kalem and the Lubin output. It was while with Mr. Nichols that Mr. Davison sold 101 copies of the first international picture made by Sid Olcott. It was "Lad From Old Ireland," in one reel, and bore the Kalem brand. Of "Colleen Bawn" and "Arrah Na Pogue," both three reelers in days when multiples were scarce, by the same producers and company, Mr. Davison sold eighty-nine and seventy-nine copies respectively. So when Mr. Davison now takes over the agency also of the Sid Olcott films he is taking on subjects with the quality of which he feels assured.

Mr. Davison in his many years in the exchange business has traveled extensively and is said to have personally greeted more than five thousand showmen in Great Britain and Ireland. This wide acquaintance has been one of the factors responsible for his success. Another has been his novel advertising schemes, which have been as successful as they were ingenious. Mr. Davison is a good business man and a good mixer. Among his associates he has the reputation of being an accomplished story teller. Mr. Davison attended the Screen Club ball, where he met many old friends. On this side the water the London film man will be represented by Fred C. Gunning, 504 Times Building.

"We are having a sort of change in the trade in England," said Mr. Davison just before he sailed. "The two-thousand-footer is dead in England. The thousand-footers and the split-reel comedies are still good there, but the three to five thousand foot features are the go right now. Everybody wants them, and that is one good reason why Davison's Film Sales Agency is glad to get hold of the Kinetophote features. I speak especially of 'The Span of Life,' in which the Kinetophote has featured Lionel Barrymore. It is, of course, primarily an English play, though it was produced here in America. Mr. Barrymore looks quite the type of Englishman who was put on the stage in Sutton Vane's melodrama of the same name. And Lyster Chambers is a very good English villain.

"We are also going to find a ready sale for the pictures which Tom Terriss will make. The name of Terriss is as powerful a drawing card in England as Barrymore's is in the United States. I have seen some of the pictures which Mr. Terriss has made and I am confident enough to leave the rest to him."

TITLE OF RELIANCE PICTURE CHANGED.

The title of the Reliance Film Company's picture scheduled for release on December 13 named "Dorothy in the Garrett" and a synopsis of which was published on page 1582 of our last week's issue, has been changed to "The Old Maid." Exhibitors will please note the change.

Row Over Paramount Program

Washington Theaters Seek to Enjoin a Competitor From Advertising and Showing the Pictures in Question.

INJUNCTION proceedings were recently instituted in the District Supreme Court by the Casino Theater and Strand Theater companies to prevent the New American Theater Company, which operates a motion picture theater at First Street and Rhode Island Avenue, N. W., Washington, D. C., from circulating any advertisement representing that it intends to show "Paramount Pictures" and from soliciting or in any manner advising persons not to visit the theaters operated by the complainants.

In their bill of complaint the plaintiffs state that they own the Garden and Strand theaters and that in the month of October the Paramount Picture Corporation, through the Famous Players Exchange in New York City, they entered into a verbal agreement for the leasing and exhibition of certain Paramount pictures, including "Such a Little Queen," "The Virginian," "The Man From Home," and "Behind the Scenes," which, with the exception of the latter, had already been shown at the Garden theatre, "Behind the Scenes" being shown at the time the suit was entered.

On Octobr 26, 1914, the Strand Theatre Company entered into a written contract with the Famous Players Exchange, which gave to it the exclusive right to exhibit these Paramount pictures in that part of the city of Washington bounded by Twentieth street on the west, U street and Florida avenue on the north, Third street, E., on the east, and the Potomac River on the south, for a period of 180 days after the last date of exhibition of the pictures, and giving to the company the exclusive right to exhibit them in the balance of the District of Columbia for a period of fifty-five days after the last date of exhibition by the Strand Theater Company, for which privilege they allege they deposited $2,000 and have paid, and are obligated to pay a certain agreed upon sum (not stated) per week during the time the contract is in force.

The plaintiffs claim that they have extensively advertised these pictures in the newspapers, as well as others of the Paramount productions, including "Aristocracy," to be shown December 13 to 15; "William Tell," to be shown on the 16th and 17th, and "The Country Mouse," December 25 and 26, and in order to further protect themselves with respect to the territory in which to exhibit, Thomas Moore, president of the Casino Theater Company, secured on November 20 an option to show the pictures in additional territory, for which he made a deposit of $200, and has obligated himself to make certain payments therefor.

The plaintiff companies claim that, notwithstand their exclusive rights to the showing of these pictures, particularly in certain named territory, the New American Theater Company has notified the residents of that section that it will show these Paramount pictures and, in wilful disregard of the plaintiff companies, has sought to persuade and induce these people to patronize its theater in response to its advertising of these plays. Exception is also taken to the character of the advertising, from which the following is quoted:

"PARAMOUNT PICTURES

"See the pictures HERE and see them RIGHT. No distortion or speeding of machines as seen in some larger houses. We have secured these productions for our patrons at great expense because they have shown their appreciation of the best features. We are saving you time and carfare. WE PLAY TO THE BETTER CLASS. ALWAYS THE BEST FOR THE PRICE. ALL SEATS 5 CENTS, EXCEPT THURSDAYS AND SUNDAYS."

Thus it is that the plaintiffs claim that they have a large patronage among the residents of the territory into which these handbills were circulated and that unless the defendants be restrained from continuing the advertising of the exhibition by it of the Paramount pictures, and from making statements inferring that the plaintiffs' theaters are not properly showing them as in the handbill quoted, many of their patrons will fail and refuse to continue to patronize them, and that great and irreparable loss and damage will be sustained; and they ask that the defendants be enjoined, pending the final determination of the suit, and perpetually from using or circulating any advertising representing that it intends to produce the pictures.

Answer has not as yet been filed by the defendants, nor did they know tht such a suit was pending until informed of the action taken by the plaintiffs by the correspondent of the Moving Picture World.

Famous Players Secures John Mason

THE Famous Players have added another valuable asset to the Paramount Program, by announcing the engagement of the celebrated and popular star, John Mason, who will be presented in the world-renowned drama, "Jim, the Penman," by Sir Charles L. Young, the heart gripping story of the great forger, who sins for love, and whose afterlife is one of remorse and dramatic retribution. Mr. Mason will, of course, play the title role, Jim Ralston, the man whose clever pen works so much harm even to his most dearly loved, and which finally writes with his heart's blood, his own punishment.

John Mason.

With a greater personal following than most other stars of the contemporarv stage, Mr. Mason represents to a remarkable degree, the individual strength of American stage celebrities, who, unlike the stars of any other nation, possess an intrinsic value aside from the attraction of the plays in which they are presented.

Mr. Mason has scored brilliant triumphs in a number of stage successes, including "The Ambassador," "The Witching Hour" and "As a Man Thinks."

"Jim, the Penman," with its powerful appeal to the emotions, coupled with the stellar importance of John Mason, should make an unusually popular photoplay, and this Famous Players production will undoubtedly develop into one of the most notable releases of this company.

THE USUAL TIMELY SUGGESTION.

At the Christmas holiday season we always try to point out to all exhibitors and others that this is the season best adapted for the purpose of proving the full importance of the instructively entertaining and outright educational pictures, especially is this applicable to religious and biblical pictures.

At no other season is there such scope for these pictures, as at no other time of the year is the public mind so receptive and expectant; whoever meets this opportunity with an appropriate program is not only up to date, but is rendering a service to humanity in particular and to educational kinematography in general. Each year sees the alreadv sufficient list of films largely augmented, so that the time has now passed for the former complaint of a lack of appropriate subjects. Every exhibitor has it in his power to meet the desires of the churches, schools, institutions, fraternities and such like demands. It should also be kept in mind that denominational requirements have now been largely met so that the pictures are made suitable to the particular church desiring to use certain pictures, this, the writer believes is particularly applicable to the great Kalem picture "The Manger to The Cross," which heads the list of pictures dealing with the story of the life of Christ. Others than exhibitors who are not familiar with the means of obtaining the best and most suitable picture are now ably helped by either of the companies named, as, between them, there are no pictures of these classes which cannot be obtained in one way or the other. May this helpful season see a marked increase in the use and profit of the instructive pictures.

W. H. J.

BUFFALO JONES IS BACK.

Buffalo Jones has returned from the jungles of the French Congo, where he routed the "Old Man Gorilla" and pursued him for miles. The natives believe that the gorilla is the god of all creation and claim when he roars that everything does and should take to the woods, yet Buffalo and Mr. Means routed him as easily as they did the lions and other wild beasts of darkest Africa. Buffalo Jones is now in vaudeville with Moss & Brill through the United Booking Offices, New York City.

"In the Land of the Head Hunters"

Remarkable Motion Picture Produced by Edward S. Curtis, Famous Authority on North American Indians.

Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

If I were asked to point to some particular film illustrating the educational value of the motion picture I would unhesitatingly mention this production. As a drama it may be a mere curiosity though even as a drama it has a singularly compelling charm. As a gem of the motion picture art it has never been surpassed. As I saw it at the Casino, New York City, with suitable music the picture is overwhelmingly beautiful and impressive. You get the impression of having feasted on one of the world's great picture galleries and there follows that most delightful of sensations, a new perception of pleasure in which the eye and the brain take special shares.

I remember many efforts to make the life of remote countries and strange tribes live on the screen. I remember how the attempt was made to get the natives into a moving picture scenario and thus render the film more acceptable. It is not a pleasing recollection by any means because all these efforts were strikingly futile. Mr. Curtis has found the short cut of genius and he eminently succeeds where others have dismally failed. It is said that Mr. Curtis is a profound student of Indian lore. This is evident enough from the films, but it does not at all explain his success with this subject on the screen. The cause of that must be sought in an extraordinary perception of artistic and dramatic values, in an uncommon skill of selection and in a sort of second sight with the camera. I confess that I learned a good deal looking at this picture. It has brought before my eyes a new vista of camera miracles. The low flight of the birds over the waters tinted and burnished by the setting sun is a veritable revelation of motion picture art. I am loath to confine myself to this one example when the recollection of others equal in beauty and power still linger hauntingly in my mind, but here I can do no more than allude to one or two beside: the capture of the whale, the scenes of the sea-lions, the dances, the wedding ceremonies, the vigil of the hero. The direction of this play entitles Mr. Curtis to high rank in that difficult profession, but it is after all only one of the lesser merits.

Mr. Curtis conceived this wonderful study in ethnology as an epic. It fully deserves the name. Indeed, it seemed to me that there was a most striking resemblance all through the films between the musical epics of Richard Wagner and the theme and treatment of this Indian epic. The fire-dance, the vigil journey with its command of silence and chastity, the whole character of the hero were most strangely reminiscent of Parsifal and the Ring of the Nibelungs. I have indicated but a few general outlines, any one can pursue the likeness in all its details to his heart's content.

Mr. Curtis has extracted from his vast materials nothing but the choicest and nothing but that which will please the eye and stir the thoughts of an intelligent white audience. All the actors are full-blooded Indians. The Indian mind is, I believe, constitutionally incapable of acting; it cannot even grasp the meaning of acting as we understand it. Probably nobody understands this fact better than Mr. Curtis. The pictures speak volumes for the producer's intimacy with the Indians and his great power over them. They are natural in every move; the grace, the weirdness and the humor of their dances have never been brought home to us like this before.

I cannot say enough for the scenic beauty of this film. Beauty does not describe that aspect of the film as fully as I would want to explain it. There is a natural beauty which simply soothes and flatters such as a pretty sunset, a fine river view, a bold rock or a beautiful shore. In this film the scenic portions have character, we feel instinctively that a virgin wilderness is conjured up before us and that the conjurer is a master craftsman, a wizard with the camera. The very solitude is there on the screen and the stern moods of Nature, the frowns no less than the smiles.

I speak advisedly when I say that this production sets a new mark in artistic handling of films in which educational values mingle with dramatic interest. Even the scenes showing the head-hunters is redeemed from the gruesome by the exceeding skill which characterizes the production as a whole. "In the Land of the Head Hunters" is a title which does not begin to describe all the film contains. It is not a feature for the nickelodeon or the cheap house, but it ought to be welcomed by the better class of houses that are looking for an occasional departure from the regular attractions and that want to give their patrons a special treat.

"Damon and Pythias" Engagement

Universal Feature Has a Strong Appeal—Drawing Splendidly at New York Theater.

THE Universal's production of "Damon and Pythias" has won immediate favor at the New York Theater and is playing to good business. It has made a strong impression with its fascinating and dramatic scenario, its splendid portraying company, its great scenes and perfection in photography. In addition to drawing splendidly with playgoers, the feature appeals strongly to the Knights of Pythias, who are booking in large parties for dates during the engagement. Last Wednesday night all of the lower floor and boxes were occupied by the Army and Navy officers stationed at Governor's Island, all of the harbor forts and the Brooklyn yard. Officers of the battleships Wyoming and Florida were also present. On Thursday twelve lodges of the Knights of Pythias of New York City were in attendance and large parties are being booked throughout the engagement.

To accommodate these and also the general playgoing public, extra performances have been added at the New York Theater. From now on two performances will be given every Saturday and Sunday night and also holiday evenings at 7 and 9 o'clock. Under the direction of the Universal the New York Theater presents an enterprising and attractive appearance. The opening on Monday, November 30, was a brilliant one and was a typical Broadway first night. On Monday night, December 7, "Damon and Pythias" will have its inaugural presentation at the Fine Arts Theater, Chicago, which the Universal has taken over for a run of this feature.

The Universal Booking offices are very active and getting fine returns from the companies now on tour. The film is meeting with big success in all of its towns and in many cities is being booked for return engagements. On Monday, December 14, "Damon and Pythias" opens for a fortnight at the DeKalb Avenue Theater, Brooklyn. The advance demand there has shown such healthy prospects that extra performances will be given throughout the engagement.

EXPENSIVE INTERIORS IN KLEINE'S 'STOP THIEF'

With characteristic lavishness George Kleine has arranged for unique and expensive interiors in his coming production, "Stop Thief," founded on the Cohan & Harris comedy of that name. The library set boasts 2,000 real books instead of the usual "prop" backs only. There is also a fine Italian renaissance mantel in carved walnut valued at $800. Beautiful Flemish tapestries for door hangings and many oil paintings add a touch of realism to the various scenes as original as it is refreshing.

The big comedy is being rapidly completed. Mary Ryan, as well as Harry Mestayer, both of whom are playing the respective leads, are enjoying the novelty of picture work, and delighted to find that they can readily exchange a successful "stage presence" for the all-essential "picture personality."

MINNIE DUPREE WITH LIFE PHOTO.

The Life Photo Film Corporation has secured an option on the services of Miss Minnie Dupree, the vaudeville and legitimate star, to appear in a forthcoming five-part feature release to be produced by that company.

Miss Dupree has received several flattering offers from almost every other photoplay producing concern in the country, and finally determined to offer her services to the Life Photo Film Corporation from Messrs. Sanger and Jordon, her agents, who are endeavoring to secure an appropriate vehicle in which Miss Dupree may be properly starred.

This adds another shining light from the legitimate stage to the ranks of photoplayers.

"The Last Egyptian"

The Long Dead Past, the Present, the East and the West Color Oz Film Romance in Five Reels.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

THERE is no doubt that this romance, "The Last Egyptian," offered on the Alliance program will be profitable to exhibitor and maker. Although picture spectators are quite familiar with Nile scenery—we are better informed in these things than any other clientele in the world—they will see a river in the background of this picture and won't know that it isn't the actual Nile. Around the Arab huts and tents that also are shown, actual palm trees are growing. The story is certainly entertaining. Being neither melodrama nor romance, strictly speaking, it has the good points of both and suffers some from its neglecting to reach the intensity that would have been possible if it had been one or the other outright. It holds well; one doesn't notice padding; there is no character in it that dissatisfies, and much of the acting is distinctly good.

The villain—he lives up to his savage lights and is not a truly melodramatic villain, for we think him the hero at first—is Kara, Ragged Son of the Sun, descendant of the Pharaohs of Egypt. He has untold treasures hidden in a tomb of the upper Nile. In the early scenes his squalid grandmother dies and tells him that she had once been badly treated by an English earl. He swears to have vengeance and when the earl with his son and granddaughter comes to Egypt, Kara now become a rich prince, tries to treat the girl in the same way—tries to deceive her by a mock marriage. Her father is in his power—his gambling has left him open to attack and Kara would have had the girl at his mercy had he not, by his sternness, excited the hatred of some of his own people, especially of his dragoman. The climax is an intense struggle in the treasure tomb under the earth, between Kara and the girl's father. Kara is shut in the treasure chamber which can be opened only from the outside and the secret of which he alone knows, so that it now is closed forever. Kara is played by Farrell McDonald and is a smooth, even piece of work. There is strength in Mai Wells's drawing of Hatatcha, his grandmother. The slave girl is well played by Jane Urban, and the English girl by Vivian Reed. C. Charles Haydon plays Tadros the dragoman.

WHO KNOWS ABOUT STREATOR?

Two months ago Harrison Streator was employed at the Family theater, Trenton, N. J. He departed suddenly, taking with him a machine and extra head and some cash. He was apprehended in another state and is being held for extradition. Streator is about 30 years of age, five feet eight inches tall, or thereabout, slim built, wears a slight mustache, is a good talker and shows upper teeth in talking. He has a Massachusetts State operator's license, a local Connecticut operator's license and a Pennsylvania chauffeur's license. The object of this notice is to learn if Streator has made a practice of taking property in other localities. Any one having information regarding him is requested to communicate with the Public Prosecutor, Trenton, N. J., or the Moving Picture World office.

Anna Luther Supporting Tom Terriss

TOM TERRISS started work this week at the Kinetophote studios at Coney Island, on the first of the series of famous Terriss plays, which he will produce and star in for the Kinetophote. He had chosen "A Man's Shadow," which he wrote for his father, the great William Terriss of the London stage, and "A Man's Shadow" went into rehearsal early on Monday afternoon.

It was learned at the Kinetophote offices the same day that Anna Luther, who has been a Lubin star for more than a year and who previous to that was a member of the old Reliance Company, where she went to leads within two months after having been cast for her first screen drama, has been chosen by Mr. Terriss to play opposite to him in the new piece. She will have the part of the wife in "A Man's Shadow."

Anna Luther.

Miss Luther is not only known for her beauty, which gained for her the titles, "The Poster Girl" and "The Fifth Avenue Girl," but also for the many daring things which she has done in pictures. Being thrown from an ocean liner, being hurled from a swift auto off the end of a pier, and other similar "stunts," have been to her the work of the day.

She was born in Newark, N. J., not so very many years ago, and went in for pictures about two and a half years ago. She has always been an athletic girl and fond of dancing, as well as out-of-door sports. In dancing she has won many cups and has received almost as many offers to go on the stage in dancing acts, but she prefers the pictures and has determined to stick to them.

ELSIE JANIS A HIT AT THE STUDIO.

When Elsie Janis starts across the stage at the Bosworth Studio everything else stops. It is the supreme moment of the day. It isn't because she is an extremest in clothes or manner; she is always the simple, unassuming little girl—but she holds the stage from entrance to exit. When she isn't singing or dancing jaunty little dances, her mimicry is wildly amusing. Then the lines that accompany her acting are always spontaneous, and it is to be regretted that the camera hasn't ears as well as eyes to register these humorous bits. In her first photoply "The Caprices of Kitty," Elsie Janis, disguised as an Italian girl, comes to an artist's studio. She did that imitation so well everyone on the stage forgot the grind of the camera and fancied themselves in the first row on an opening night. After writing the play she lived it; Kit was more or less Elsie Janis, though Elsie Janis has made Kit so delightfully real, original and sympathetic we shall always, after seeing her, carry a mental miniature in the locket we wear around our neck or—the locket that dangles at the end of our watch fob!

Youth will enjoy "The Caprices of Kitty," because it is the natural story of youth, and what is more pleasing to those who have passed into the summer and autumn of life than a review of the very joy of the days "when we were twenty-one."

TURNER & DAHNKEN COMPANY FORMED IN LONDON.

The Turner & Dahnken Controlling Company, of San Francisco, has been formed at London, England, with a capital stock of $2,500,000, of which $1,000,000 has been privately underwritten in that city. With the increased capital at its command the Turner & Dahnken Circuit, which now conducts seven large houses in northern California, with several others in course of erection, plans to add still others.

"The Sower Reaps"

A Tragedy That Turns Out Not to Be a Murder, in Two Reels, by the American.

Reviewed by James S. McQuade.

THOMAS RICKETTS has directed with his customary care the filming of a story that has to do with the rivalry of two candidates for a political office, in which the more worthy of the two wins out, not a very ordinary event in the history of ballots. The story is clearly told in the films, without any attempt to make the scene of the tragedy one of lurid melodrama. We view a lively chase, in which the brother of the man suspected of the crime succeeds in getting evidence that will free the accused before the proper authority. When we come to study the nature of this evidence, we easily assign a reason for the employment of such spectacular means to get it in safe hands.

Peter Pelham (Jack Richardson), the incumbent of the district attorney's office, is trying to succeed himself, but finds a dangerous rival in Ben Rolfe (Wm. Garwood), the schoolmaster. Pelham attempts to bribe Rolfe to get out of the race, but the latter refuses. Soon afterwards Rolfe discovers that Old Miser Pike (Harry von Meter) has a strange hold on Pelham. Unknown to the Schoolmaster, the miser holds proofs of bribery against the district attorney and regularly blackmails him. This begets a deadly hatred of the miser by Pelham, who is overheard exclaiming the wish to get the miser out of his way.

Ben Rolfe has a younger brother, Tim, who is a loafer and drunkard. Tim learns that the miser hides his money somewhere in the woods, and follows the old man one night when he is about to visit the place. He robs the miser of his gold and flees from the spot, leaving the old man unconscious. Pelham had heard the report of the shot fired by the miser at Tim and rushes to the spot. The miser recovers consciousness and fires at him, taking him to be the man who had knocked him senseless. Pelham secures the pistol and to save his own life shoots the old man. He then flees to his home.

Ben Rolfe chances to be in the woods making love to the miser's daughter, Laurel (Vivian Rich), on the fateful night. They rush to the scene, where Ben picks up the pistol. He notices the imprint of fingers on the barrel and preserves it by folding the weapon in his handkerchief. In the meantime Pelham and others return to the secne and angry words pass between him and Ben. In a struggle Pelham leaves the imprint of his right hand fingers on Ben's bare arm. The exact correspondence of the imprint on the pistol with that on the arm leads to the clearing of Ben's brother Tim and the confession of his guilt by Pelham. The latter escapes the charge of murder by proving that he acted in self defense, as the right hand of the dead man still clutched a murderous stone.

The acting in the photoplay is creditable and the photography fully up to the American standard. The release date is December 21.

Darwin Karr

"KARR of Karr Valley"—that's Darwin Karr. It isn't every photoplayer who can link his family name with a particular spot of this old earth, but Karr Valley, a pretty vale near Rochester, New York, owes its name to the Vitagraph star's forefathers, otherwise it might have been christened with one of those long, and equally unpronounceable, Indian cognomens. Darwin grew to youth in Karr Valley, and at the age of eighteen had decided that industrial work was "the life" for him, for he was strolling about with the title of "superintendent" in one of Karr Valley's knitting mills.

Darwin Karr.

Then, in an unwary moment, the Vitagraph "Life Portrayer" became interested in amateur dramatic circles. The result? A year or two later found him playing leading roles in stock, to the edification of the matinee girls who, in this day and generation, have turned photoplay fans. Engagements with dramatic and musical comedy companies on the road and on Broadway followed until he was captured by vaudeville, and for some time he toured the country as a two-a-day headliner.

A summer vacation found Darwin Karr in New York and he decided that, sooner than accept a stock engagement in a distant city, he would remain idle. This was less than four years ago, when the Rialto was first beginning to take serious notice of the motion picture. Karr thought he would try his hand at the new game and loitered about the Edison studio until he was given a chance in a small part. When the picture was shown on the screen the astute Edisonites discovered that they had another real actor in their midst, and Karr was placed at the head of a company sent to the Thousand Islands. The die was cast—Karr was from that time on a picture player.

Several films were produced in the Thousand Islands for the Edison Company, one catching the eye of the Blaches and resulting in an offer too tempting to be resisted. Darwin Karr went to the Solax Company with a year's contract—and stayed two—then in September, 1913, he joined the Vitagraph Company. While with the latter company he has been seen in a score of one and two-reel pictures, but his principle work has been in the Broadway Star productions. "The Tangle" and "Mr. Barnes of New York" are two of these pictures that have been successful at the Vitagraph Theater, and he is now working on another multiple reeler in which he will be featured.

FILM SHOWS WHO GOT THE GOODS.

Clarence Jay Elmer, of the Lubin Studios, who plays one of the leading roles in "The Patsy Bolivar" series, Lubin's newest collection of comedies, says the motion picture camera has 'em all beaten when it comes to doing detective work. In one of the series Patsy has an adventure with pirates. The pirates obtained for the occasion were a villainous looking lot, and during the action of the play they capture Elmer. In the struggle the pirates stand Elmer on his head and everything in his pockets drops out. When the scene ended Elmer was able to find a few pennies on the ground, but nothing else, and not one of the pirates apparently knew where the lost articles were.

Recently when the reel was shown in the projecting room of the big Lubin establishment Elmer discovered what had happened to his lost property. One of the pirates was seen on the film to bend over quickly, pick up the things that had dropped from Elmer's pocket and stuff them into his own pocket. Needless to say, with this evidence Elmer had little difficulty in getting his property back again.

"A Question of Courage"

Two-Reel Majestic Drama of the Rebellion, Admirably Conceived and Treated.

The Widow.....Mrs. Crowell.
Rebel, her youngest son.....Elmer Clifton.

Reviewed by Louis Reeves Harrison.

THERE is nobility of character throughout the development of "A Question of Courage" that instantly places it above the average as a play, and the treatment is so responsive to the purpose that there is a completeness thoroughly satisfying in the release. Only one son is mentioned in the cast, though the window has three, and they should have been named, also the family servant, an entirely new impersonation. The men in the cast are all forceful in a natural way, a way that is not offensively theatrical, and the widow herself is a veritable star.

Mrs. Crowell is a stout woman, very stout, and she dresses in an old-fashioned way that emphasized the fact rather than conceals it. Such types are rarely selected for heroines, especially where sympathetic interest is to be aroused in a character. So much more to Mrs. Crowell's credit as an actress. She gives her role dignity that constantly grows on one as the story develops. Her performance is one of the most consistent and intelligent I have recently had the pleasure of seeing. Almost second to her impersonation is the very natural one of her serving woman. These two, the three boys, the army officers and subordinates form a homogeneous body in a line of acting that jars at no period and charms most of the time.

The story is that of a widow who sends her three boys to the war, the story of many a widow in Europe at this moment. She parts with them bravely enough, and they are a credit to her in the conflict. The eldest falls and the sad news reaches home. Supreme courage dominates the bereaved woman. She drapes a vacant chair with a flag taken from her soldier husband's picture and lives awaiting news of the others. Another dread letter arrives. How two of the noble fellows fell in performance of duty is depicted in advance. Again the mother tries to support her trial, though her health fails. Then word comes from her youngest that his regiment is to pass within twelve miles of home, affording him a chance to see her.

A battle is pending when he arrives—he has but a few moments to spare, but mother cannot part with him. She conspires with the servant to put sleeping powders in his coffee and even holds her boy up at the pistol point until they have taken effect. She is stealing her only child from Demon War. The boy is arrested as a deserter in consequence and a court martial meets to decide his fate. Mother puts on her bonnet, has the old nag hitched up, and she drives over rough roads through many perils to save her child.

Meanwhile a general and his staff stop at the house and learn from the old servant what has transpired. They ride away to interfere. The court is in session, the boy is about to be condemned, when Mother arrives and proclaims her guilt. It is in vain. She, however, holds the assemblage long enough for the general and his staff to reach the scene. The general formulates a new code on the spot, one that would be effective in Europe just now. He decides that "this woman has given enough of her blood to the country," and his curt command dismisses the case. The boy is saved to brighten his mother's declining days when the war is over. The play is patriotic and it stirs the sympathies through exceptionally fine treatment.

Patrick O'Malley in Edison Stock

LIKE his famous namesake, Charles O'Malley, the famous dragoon and rider of fiction, Patrick O'Malley has practically ridden himself into the Edison Stock Company through his wonderful bareback riding in a film, "In His Father's Footsteps," to be released January 30th. When the film was first shown, seasoned players, to whom the young actor was not fully known, kept on edge with the thrill of his performance, asked almost with one breath, "Who is he?"

With the play's dramatic moment hinging upon the riding, O'Malley rides bareback over country fences, jumps stone wall after stone wall, rising seven feet in the air on the jump, goes down cliffs, or swims rivers with a nerve that keeps the spectator on edge.

Patrick O'Malley.

O'Malley's riding skill was gained in the mountains of Pennsylvania where he was born at Forrest City, September 3, 1890. The dare-devil spirit of the lad finds him at eight years of age doing a slack-wire act on the stage, which he later followed intermittently. Though he has appeared in only a few Edison films, O'Malley is not new to pictures as his experience covers this country, England and Ireland. He has appeared in the Edison, "The Best Man," "Who Goes There?" and in "The Young Lord Stranleigh" series. O'Malley has been with the Sid Olcott International productions, the Gene Gauntier Feature Players, and the Kalem Company, playing comedy, character and dramatic roles. He has a pleasing, engaging film appearance, and is modest and bashful to a degree not to be guessed at from seeing his dare-devil riding.

First planned by Director Eugene Nowland as an educational, O'Malley's performance put such a thrill into the film "In His Father's Footsteps," that Edison, rating it now as one of its best future releases, will put it out as a regular drama. O'Malley, as the hired man in love with the farmer's daughter who is dangerously ill with fever through the father's lack of sanitary precautions, lifts the play by his acting and the ride that brings the doctor in the nick of time. But O'Malley is more than a rider—he will prove to be one of the most popular of the Edison talented players through his acting.

ACTION AGAINST PATHE FRERES DISMISSED.

The misuse of Cupid's darts have ceased to be original. Judge Rose, in the United States District Court, has decided in dismissing the infringement action brought against Pathe Freres by Edgar Wilson Nye, a scenario writer.

"The idea of a misuse of the weapons in Cupid's Armory does not strike one as being original at this late day in the world's history," said Judge Rose. "It is scarcely a pioneer conception. Whether a copyright obtained for the particular working out and development of such an idea has or has not been infringed, depends therefore upon a careful comparison of the way in which the central conception was worked out in the original and in the alleged infringement. There is no testimony in this case from which I can form any idea as to how the infringing representation worked out the basic idea."

The plaintiff alleged the photoplay produced by the film company, entitled "Cupid's Stolen Arrows," constituted an infringement of a scenario written by him and sought to recover damages and obtain injunctive relief.

In both scenarios Cupid's weapons were stolen by an Imp while the artful sharpshooter was asleep and the well-laid plans of Cupid were sadly mixed up until he recovered possession of his bow and arrows and righted matters in the final scene.

"C. O. D.," A Scream

A Broadway Star Feature That Is High-Class Comedy—Now on the Screen at the Vitagraph Theater.

FREDERICK CHAPIN wrote a play and called it "C. O. D.;" the Vitagraph Company secured the right to make a picture of it; Charles Brown wrote that play into picture form and Director Tefft Johnson with a selected company of Vitagraphers turned it into a four-part motion picture. Chapin we all know quite well; Charles Brown is not so well known and, although Johnson has had his name hitched to some pretty good Vitagraph "life portrayals," he will have to go some if he makes another picture that will make him better known to the picture lovers of this land than will "C. O. D."

"A laughing comedy in four parts," the program of the Vitagraph theatre says, but the "four parts" have nothing to do with the "comedy" or the "laughing," which are continuous, proof of which statement may be had by any doubting ones if they will drop in on the entertainment presented this week at the Vitagraph theater, 44th street and Broadway, New York.

Know Tefft Johnson? Well, he's a six-foot athlete with a perpetual twinkle in his eyes, a big balance in the fund of good nature and an inexhaustible bag of tricks. The life of many a social gathering when he is at play, it is only natural that he should inject a lot of his vivacity into his work and especially into the kind of work he works at—producing motion pictures. Yes; Chapin wrote it, that's true, and his idea was clever. Brown "picturized" it, as they say at the Vitagraph studio, and that's some job, too. But, listen, Johnson produced it, directed it, sweat over it and (whisper this) swore numerous classic and mighty oaths (under his breath, of course) in the doing of it. There's good reason, too. Look at the cast: Hughie Mack—it certainly took much moral suasion to put Hughie through the paces of this comedy. Now, we don't mean that Hughie "isn't there;" he is, and very much, at that—something like three hundred pounds there, but he gyrates through the whole four parts with sylphlike grace and scores at every opportunity. Hughie, with Harry Davenport and Charles Brown, constitute a trio of deceitful husbands who are to blame for all the trouble and most of the laughs in this peer of comedies.

It all started this way: These three husbands connived together to get away from their wives for a few days. By feigning illness they separately obtained permission to go to the country and collectively went. Subsequently the wives, comparing notes, discover the deception and decided to go to the country for a little lark, too.

A railroad wreck interrupts the plasure of the husbands, but they emerge from the debris of a sleeping car clad only in pajamas and continue their pilgrimage, bringing up at a farm house whose owner, Farmer Jones (William Shea) recognizes them for a trio of escaped convicts and sets them to work till he can get the prison authorities to come for them and pay the reward offered for their capture.

While these events are happening the wives arrive safely at their country hotel, make the acquaintance of three summer boys and soon set out for a joy ride. Fate and an automobile bring them to Farmer Jones' house for dinner, whereupon the fun commences. The plot, now well advanced, thickens when the same automobile and a worse fate leaves the wives and their escorts stranded on a country road and compels them to walk back in the rain and at night to the house of the same Farmer Jones, for while they were upon the road the three husbands have managed to prove their identity to the farmer and are given comfortable quarters in the rooms of his three daughters, who have been bribed to sleep elsewhere. Consequently, when Mrs. Jones, returning from town, brings in the three bedraggled wives and attempts to assign them to the same rooms, the situation is not to be described, it must be seen.

The troubles of both husbands and wives are straightened out at last, but there is a wealth of fun in the straightening. It would seem that the director had overlooked no bit of business calculated to cause a laugh: if he had it would have been of no consequence, for the audience of which the writer was one, could not have laughed more, no matter what the provocation. And mind you, there was no "slap-stick" stuff, no vulgarity, no camera tricks, no acrobatics. Just plain comedy, exaggerated in spots, perhaps, but wholesome and genuinely humorous.

Where does the "C. O. D." come in? Why, C. O. Darlington, C. O. Drudge and C. O. Dusenberry, the three "husbands" mentioned before. Their "wives" were Eulalie Jensen, Mabel Kelly and Edwina Robbins, all capable. Jack Bulger, William Dunn and Stephen Lennon and suitable "summer dudes" and Farmer Jones' daughters were Ethel Corcoran, Mary Anderson and Ruth Edwards, all pretty and vivacious. Charles Edwards' portrayal of Lem, the hired man, was correspondingly good.

Exhibitors in New York and those who can get here, should try to see this picture; it is something they should have when it is offered for booking.

Other Numbers.

There are other numbers on this program, but we have space only to mention titles: "Sunshine and Shadows," a two-part comedy-drama that touches the heart; "A Strand of Blond Hair," more good comedy, and "What the Moon Saw," a one-act play—not a picture—which is a gem of its kind, featuring Sidney Drew. Altogether the Vitagraph has offered few, if any, programs better than this.

Frederick De Belleville With Dyreda

THE Dyreda Art Film Corporation is to be congratulated on signing Frederick De Belleville to act in a feature motion picture, which will be produced under the direction of J. Searle Dawley.

Mr. De Belleville is one of the best known and most justly popular actors in this country and has long occupied an exceedingly important place on the American stage, having been leading man for Minnie Maddern Fiske, James O'Neill, Rose Coghlan and other stars too numerous to mention.

Frederick De Belleville.

He is an actor of force, vividness and discretion and his methods are as legitimate as they are graphic and telling, his portrayals of the extremely difficult roles of Nortier in "Monte Cristo" and of Des Prunelles in "Divorcons" caused considerable favorable comment throughout the world.

Mr. De Belleville will be seen for the first time in motion pictures in the feature "A Daughter of the People," which will be released through the World Film Corporation some time in January and will be eagerly looked forward to by the many who have seen Mr. De Belleville on the legitimate stage.

BALBOA CAMERAMAN ARRESTED AS SPY.

Arrested as a military spy in Long Beach, Cal., taken to the city prison and subjected to a "third degree" ordeal of questioning, was the experience recently of Carl von Pagh-Winther, a cameraman in the employ of the Balboa Amusement Producing Company of Long Beach, who is known in local moving picture circles as "The Baron," because of his fierce, bristling mustache, Danish ancestry and markedly military bearing. The arrest was made by Detective T. G. Cervantes of the Long Beach police department, who acted on advices he had received from San Pedro, seven miles distant, that "The Baron" and a mysterious male friend had eaten dinner in a San Pedro restaurant and had talked of submarines, military warfare and, so the message stated, had displayed revolvers and had adjusted the mechanism of the weapons. Mr. Horkheimer very shortly secured his release.

BUSHMAN IN "THE SLIM PRINCESS."

Francis X. Bushman fits so aptly the character of the young American millionaire in George Ade's play, "The Slim Princess," as though the part had originally been made especially for him.

The play, which has been produced by Essanay, represents the leading character as a dashing young American who goes after what he wants regardless of the rules and customs of the European court and gets it.

The young man falls in love with a Turkish princess. Instead of submitting to the almost impossible barrier between them, he goes to work in the true American style and wins her.

Music for the Picture

Conducted by CLARENCE E. SINN

THE Bridgeport Morning Telegram (Bridgeport, Conn.) contained an editorial which should be of interest to our readers. I give it in full:

"The Music Drama of the Future."

"Those who are witnessing the remarkable picture play 'Cabiria' at Poli's theater this week are seeing something that establishes an entirely new kind of drama—a genuine melodrama, approaching an ideal sought by some of the greatest musicians, among them Wagner, Bizet and our own MacDowell—an ideal expressed in the wedding of musical art to dramatic art in such a way as to form a perfect whole without incongruities of any kind.

"The ordinary combination of musical and dramatic art in vogue throughout the world today is grand opera, but this possesses such glaring and obvious defects as an artistic medium that it is small wonder that the music masters of the world sought for means of improving and perfecting it.

"Grand opera is not a perfect dramatic art, because the characters in it cannot be true to life for innumerable reasons, some of them technical, some physical, and all inherent. Romeo and Juliet, madly in love, do not stand ten feet apart and sing at each other in real life, but they do in grand opera. A real Lohengrin, looking for a fight, does not wage battle by means of his vocal chords—but he does in grand opera. The moment that we begin to sing a drama that is supposed to be a replica of real life, the absurdities become so manifest that the artistic effect is constantly ruined by the awakening of a tendency to laughter, while the illusion is wholly dispelled. Great singers, too, are seldom great actors, and scarcely ever are they cast physically for the dramatic roles they are called upon to fill; hence the additional absurdity of obviously aged soprano Juliettes playing opposite to equally aged and ridiculously fat tenor Romeos.

"To overcome this difficulty some of the greatest musicians have attempted at various times the production of melodrama —a genuine drama, acted as true to life as stage art could make it, roles filled by the very best actors and actresses, and perfect in every detail from the view-point of dramatic art—this to be accompanied by a continuous flow of operatic music reflecting, interpreting and enhancing the changing moods of the drama, and exercising a powerful emotional appeal upon the audience. But here again was a great difficulty—the actors must declaim against music, and music must struggle against declamation. It wouldn't work.

"But in the moving picture we have all difficulties solved. The acting is perfect, the staging is incomparable, the whole is in pantomime, and a production, once fixed in the films, is absolutely standardized and can be set to music that will fit it, once and for all, as perfectly as a glove fits the hand. The producers of Cabiria have attempted to realize, in part at least, this ideal, and hence the big orchestra that accompanies the play, and the hidden chorus have a score that follows every turn of the great drama that is presented. Perhaps one of the world's great future musicians will see the possibilities thus presented and such a combination of music and drama will be established as a permanent form of art.

"More than four years ago this department prophesied that in time the best composers would recognize the opportunity the moving picture offers for the wedding of drama and music. In my humble opinion there is no 'perhaps' about it; it just naturally stands to reason that it must come. Possibly not all pictures will be thus fitted—probably only the better ones. Not only that, I believe that portions of these will be given without any music; music will be introduced when it really enhance the dramatic effect. It is conceivable that a whole reel might be made which would be more effective when shown without musical accompaniment. Patrons of the Strand Theater (New York City) may one day see this exemplified—if Mr. Rothapfel hasn't already shown it.

"They who are so fortunate as to see 'Cabiria' and hear its splendid orchestral setting will agree with the editor of the Bridgeport Morning Telegram that such a combination of music and drama (in their best forms) suggests a permanent form of art. They will also belive that this particular form of art is now well on its way."

Displaying Music Titles.

Miss Florence L. Currier—ever welcome visitor—rises to make a few remarks:

"Congratulations on the ever increasing value of your music page in the Moving Picture World. It most certainly is growing of more value to we picture music people each issue and has become to us one of the necessities. I wonder if a short item on page 807 of the November 7 issue of the World came to your attention. Here is a perfectly well meaning person who says: 'One innovation that would meet with popular favor and supply an existing demand, would be to have cards with prominent lettering display the names of the lesser known musical numbers as they are played.'—Here we are trying our best to have musicians subjugate their music to the screen play, and some one comes along who wants a sort of heralded vaudeville made out of our programs. If only our musicians would be willing to forget self and play the actual pictures with the most careful interpretation, then we would actually accomplish something really worth while, but the instant any musical selection detracts from the picture to itself, that very moment it ceases to be a part of the picture show and is rather a concert in itself."

This department has always taken the attitude that the picture is the show. If music is used, it should be accessory to the picture only—not pushed into the center of the stage to share the honors (or steal them), from the main attraction. It is all very well to make music one of the attractions at the picture theater. You will also make talking points of your lights, ventilation, attention to patrons' comfort and so forth, but it is not well to intrude any of these on your patrons' attention to the detraction of the picture, so why should you seek to center their attention on music rather than the picture? And why should any one but the local music dealer suggest that you display disconcerting signs to the audience, announcing that the pianist is playing "The Goose Step" or the "Mule Trot."

Miss Currier further says: "I should like to personally congratulate the drummer whose Rules for Drummers appeared in issue of November 7. He is so decidedly right and his sarcasm is so pointedly direct that my prejudice against all drummers is somewhat mollified."

A National Anthem.

I am in receipt of a copy of a new song called "America, Star of the West," written by Mrs. Theresa L. T. Hoppe of Portland, Oregon. This song is designed by the composer as a national anthem for the United States of North America. I am informed also that a copy of the song has been mailed to each of the moving picture manufacturers.

In connection with this I wish to state that when publications are mentioned in this page for review or criticism or any other reason, it does not mean that the Moving Picture World has them for sale. Some time ago I mentioned a new publication and have been "pelted" with inquiries about it ever since. I will mention most anything which looks interesting to this department whenever it comes to my attention. If the sponsors haven't enough enterprise to advertise their wares it is not my fault. In the publication referred to I gave the name of the publisher and the city. Please don't write to me for the articles I may mention here—I don't sell them.

Extemporaneous Playing.

Mrs. R. R. Malta, Montana, says: "I would like to know what is considered the best music for small or medium sized picture houses. Have been playing pictures for some time and find that improvising pleases better than anything I have tried so far. I do not enjoy hearing one trying to fit tunes to pictures unless it is to sketch in some fitting melody to certain scenes, and I do not think it sounds well to continue the melody after the scene changes to something radically different. Will take plain piano work for mine."

By which I presume the lady means she prefers the piano to orchestral accompaniment to pictures. So far as the merits of different "methods" are concerned, it depends altogether upon who is doing the playing. If you are a clever improvisor and "handy" at inventing descriptive music for the various pictorial episodes, you are perfectly right in using your gift. But there are many who cannot invent musical themes at all—and many who think they can when they are only fooling themselves. I have heard some who kept up a continuous, monotonous thump, thump, thump on chords in eight notes, without a vestige of melody. In such cases I would have much preferred a few tunes—providing they almost fit the sentiment of the picture. There is no doubt but that a good extemporaneous player can supply a better musical setting than can one who must depend upon notes. But again I say, it all depends on the player.

Kalem Mystery Series

Has Twenty Detective Puzzles Which Will Be Solved in Two-Part Pictures.

A DECIDED novelty in series stories is about to be released by Kalem Company, under the general heading of "The Girl Detective Series." Assisted by a detective whose name is a household world, Kalem will endeavor to solve twenty mysteries which at various times have engrossed the attention of the country.

Scene from "The Affair of the Deserted House" (Kalem)

Each mystery will be dealt with in a two-act episode. One of these episodes will be released every Wednesday, commencing with January 27th. The first of the series will be "The Affair of the Deserted House."

The central figure of "The Girl Detective" series will be a society girl with a penchant for detective work. This young lady, whose name is Ruth, will endeavor to clear up the problems and bring the evil-doers to justice.

It has been a source of complaint in the past that in detective stories told on the screen, matters so shape themselves that the veriest tyro, to say nothing of an experienced detective, would have an easy time in solving the mystery. In the Kalem series, however, the detective employed by the producers works by deduction and does not depend upon time-worn artifices of the stage in showing how the various crimes were perpetrated.

Therefore, Ruth, guided by this individual, is to all intents and purposes working on the original incident upon which the Kalem story is based. Common sense, plus decided detective ability, are what she uses to help her in her work. Miracles and coincidences have no place in these stories.

For certain reasons, the name of the detective who has outlined the solution of the various mysteries for Kalem, cannot be mentioned. His method of working stands out in "The Girl Detective" series, and the majority of photoplay patrons will have no difficulty in recognizing his master hand.

But of supreme interest to exhibitors is the announcement that the series is to be part of Kalem's regular program. It will take the place of the regular two-act production now being issued on Wednesday. Exhibitors will therefore receive a great money-bringing attraction without a penny's increase in cost over their regular service. This is in line with Kalem's practice—a practice established when "The Alice Joyce" series, and "The Hazards of Helen Railroad" series were first issued. These are released in regular service and are proving tremendous successes.

In "The Affair of the Deserted House," the photoplay "fan" is introduced to Ruth and is shown the circumstances which lead to her taking up detective work. Her first problem deals with the rounding up of a band of counterfeiters who have been giving the Federal authorities all sorts of trouble. The clever manner in which she brings these criminals to book attracts the attention of the police authorities and Ruth is appointed special investigator.

Motion Pictures from Holland

Hollandia Film Company Will Release Some Subjects Through Kinetophotes.

THE Kinetophote has just completed arrangements with the Hollandia Film Manufacturing Co., of Haarlem, Holland, whereby the Kinetophote will take over such of the Hollandia pictures as are available for the United States, Canada and New Foundland. Such films as the Kinetophote takes over will be released through the K. C. Booking Co., Incorporated, in the United States, and the K. C. Booking Co., Limited, of Montreal, as well as through the exchanges affiliated with the K. C. Company.

Jan Leendertz, representative of the Hollandia Company, arrived in this country on the "Rotterdam" a week or more ago, bringing with him 25,000 feet of film, a part of which was accepted by the Kinetophote as being of sufficient merit to take with American audiences. It was stated at the Kinetophote offices that none of the Hollandia film is to be taken which does not come up to such specifications and, therefore, such of the film as was accepted is replete enough with action and good photography as to make it available for the American market.

Mr. Leendertz, who is an expert in the land of dykes on the question of motion pictures, is stopping at the McAlpin, but expects to return to Holland on the "Nieuw Amsterdam" when that ship sails on December 12. Mr. Leendertz knows the film game in Holland from start to finish and talks most interestingly on conditions in the business there which have arisen as the result of the war.

"One condition which I remember very well, which arose from the war," he said, "was a condition which was imposed upon me by my associates in the Hollandia Company before leaving. They told me that if the "Rotterdam" should happen to strike a mine I was not to come back without a moving picture of the catastrophe. You may be sure that I looked anxiously for any sign of such a happening, but not for the purpose of taking it.

"Our company is the only company in Holland manufacturing films, and we find an excellent market for our output. We do not, however, market any of our films ourselves; we sell through the oldest agent in Holland, who distributes films all over Holland and Dutch colonies.

"But we do not have the proposition of a feature every day in many motion picture theaters, such as you do here. In Holland a theater books a feature for one week or, at the most, two each week.

"After the war broke out there was a great boom in the motion picture trade because so many of what you call the legitimate theaters were closed. At once there was a demand for a cheaper amusement and the motion picture supplied it. However, prices were lowered a little in the picture houses, due to the depression caused by the war, and because there was a fear that Holland might be dragged into it. Now we know that we shall not be implicated in the controversy, and things were brightening up to a considerable extent when I left Holland.

"We try to get stars for our pictures the same as you do in this country right now. For instance, in one or two of the films which we have brought to the Kinetophote Corporation, we used H. L. Chrispijn, director the Royal theater in Amsterdam. He not only was the star of the piece, but he directed the picture. We were very fortunate to get him, because usually his time is all taken up at the Royal theater. We made no films at all during August after the outbreak of the war, but we got going again in October and our plant is working to full capacity now."

UNIVERSAL GETS LONERGAN.

Lloyd F. Lonergan, author of "The Million Dollar Mystery" and of almost every Thanhouser photoplay, from the inception of that concern, has quit his position of producing manager of the Thanhouser establishment to become a writer of features for the Universal eastern stars. He is now spending much time in conference with Julius Stern, manager of the Imp studio, and with Ben Wilson, William Garwood and Miss Mary Fuller, for whom latter stars he will create his first Universal stories. The acquisition of Mr. Lonergan, whose record of Thanhouser successes has placed him in the front rank of American scenario experts, is considered one of the most important the Universal has made of late.

"The Ghost Breaker"

A Multiple Reel Lasky Production of Unusual Merit—Has Many Thrills and Much Humor.

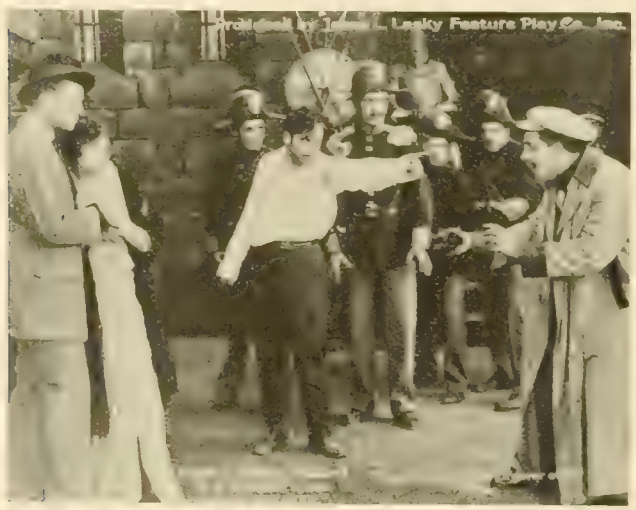
Reviewed by W. Stephen Bush.

I AM glad to dip my pen in the ink of laudation, which, of late, has threatened to run dry. "The Ghost Breaker" is one of the few pictures that measure up to the full definition of a great feature. It has, to begin with, the solid substance which makes the feature stand out above the rank and file of films; it has the right qualities of form; the dramatic construction is bold, but clear and consistent; the acting of the principal characters must meet the most exacting expectations and there is the overshadowing advantage of originality plus variety.

"The Ghost Breaker" had a long run on the speaking stage, but I really believe that its success on the screen will be even greater.

The subject offered extraordinary possibilities to a high-class film producer, and it must be said that the Lasky Company rose fully to every one of them. To provide an hour's first-class entertainment the producing company has been simply extravagant in its outlay of time, care and money. This ambitious striving, this desire to give the public the best at any cost, finds its reward in keen public appreciation. Audiences at the Strand are critical, but the picture had not been on its way five minutes before I saw the zest of enjoyment on all the faces around me, and after that it was only a question of how big and emphatic the public approval would be.

The subject itself is one which must always appeal to an



Scene from "The Ghost Breaker." (Lasky).

American audience. American humor is world-famous. We love to see young Americans brush aside the ceremonies and conventions of the Old World and go directly to the point. Imagine a haunted castle having any terrors for a young Kentuckian from the feud-belt. Here, in stately and ceremonious Arragon, is a castle containing fabulous treasure. It belongs to an ancient Spanish family, which has vainly sought to locate the hidden wealth of its ancestors. The head of the house goes into the castle to search and is never heard of again. The son and heir then enters the mysterious ruin and he, too, is heard of no more. The peasants in the country firmly believe that the castle is haunted by evil spirits and none can be found to go near it after dark, let alone enter it. The locket containing an accurate description of the hiding place of the jewels has been stolen by a thievish maid. The locket is traced to America and the princess of the House of Arragon, bemoaining the disappearance of father and brother, boldly starts out for New York and succeeds in finding a trace of the jewel soon after her arrival.

Through the murder of his father, Warren Jarvis, of Kentucky, is drawn into the plot. Tracing the murderer to New York he meets and kills him in a New York hotel and effects his escape by entering the room of the princess. Jarvis is so much of a gentleman that he secures the sympathy of the princess who hides him from the detectives and subsequently enlists his assistance in her efforts to solve the mystery of the ancient castle. After many hair-breadth escapes from all sorts of medieval tricks and devices Jarvis locates the treasure and marries the heiress.

Humor, pathos, thrills, genuine melodrama, novelty place this feature in the first flight of today's American-made pictures. There were fine flashes of inspiration on the part of the director. The journey on the ocean was just indicated by a huge funnel with the whistle blowing—the whole thing close up. The effect was instantaneous. Never was the action of a play advanced more skillfully. The interior settings were good, a rare thing, even in the best of features. One of the cleverest touches in the feature and characteristic of the attention to detail is the descent of the two detectives on the rope-ladder from the steamer into their boat below. It is a trifle perhaps, but it shows to what lengths the producers have gone to make their work as perfect as possible.

H. B. Warner has made fast friends with the camera and his effort in "The Ghost Breaker" is nothing short of masterly. Every part was exceedingly well taken and the minor parts stood out as very clever work. I think the opening scenes were a most unique and entertaining use of the possibilities of double exposure work. The feature gives the exhibitor a splendid chance to show what he can do by way of presenting a picture.

James W. Castle

A DISTINCT stroke of good fortune is the acquisition by the Edison Company of James W. Castle as a director, for he brings with him all the wealth of successful experience gathered in his rise from call-boy many years ago, to the position of owner of well-known stage productions. Mr. Castle will devote practically his entire time to directing Edison comedies—and that fact is sufficient to warant comedies of a high order of real funniness.

That is not, however, Mr. Castle's first appearance in directing motion pictures as he spent some time as director for the Vitagraph. In his own productions, in partnership with George D. Baker, he directed such well-known successes as "Graustark," Harold McGrath's "Goose Girl,," and "The Bishop's Carriage, the rights of which he bought from Liebler.

James W. Castle.

An association which Mr. Castle recalls with reminiscent pleasure is the two seasons he spent as director for Madame Schumann-Heink endeavored to persuade him to go with her to Europe to prepare for Grand Opera work.

For two years, Mr. Castle had a valuable and successful experience as director of the famous Bush Temple Stock Company of Chicago, which has turned out so many stars. He also directed the F. F. Proctor Stock Company and held the same position with "Quo Vadis" and with "When Johnny Comes Marching Home," having under him in one company such an aggregation of stars as Marie Cahill, Raymond Hitchcock, William T. Carleton, Adele Ritchie, and other luminaries.

"THE SEATS OF THE MIGHTY" IN LOS ANGELES.

W. L. Clune, manager of the largest motion picture theater in the West, the Auditorium, in Los Angeles, has arranged with the World Film Corporation to show the Sir Gilbert Parker photoplay, "The Seats of the Mighty," starting December 14 at the Auditorium. Only the largest and best features available are used by Mr. Clune in that theater which, up to the time he took possession, was the home of the biggest traveling attractions, as for example, the Metropolitan Grand Opera Pavlowa, and stars of her type. Under Mr. Clune's management the Auditorium has been a wonderful success. Features are seen there for indefinite engagements. "The Escape," for example, played six weeks; "The Spoilers," three weeks, and the clientele of the Auditorium is composed of the finest theater-goers in the capital of southern California. In booking "The Seats of the Mighty," Mr. Clune feels that he has an attraction that will set a new record in attendance at his popular playhouse.

"Should a Woman Divorce"

Burdened by Useless Title an Ivan Five-reel Production Tells Its Simple Story in Human Way.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

IN spite of its foolish but stentoriously self-advertising title, this Ivan five-reel offering, telling its story of martial difficulties in a clean-handed way, has nothing really to do with social problems; it teaches nothing except that to go counter to accepted social ideas is to bring unhappiness. It does not reinforce this teaching either, for though it shows something of the unhappiness that a woman who acts foolishly brings upon herself, her friends and relatives, it ends by affirming that she is determined to live henceforth for her children alone; but fails to bring out the fact that the two children have been the most wronged of all. It is crammed full of humanity, but has no social propaganda value whatever. It is simply a story that Ivan Abramson has made up, using what license he needed, such as total disregard of American divorce laws, to make his picture entertaining. He has been eminently successful in this and it is clear that he has done it with sincerity and a human feeling in his heart; for his characters convince and in restrained presentation of themselves strongly engage our sympathy.

There is a distinct Semitic atmosphere in it all. Strange, almost amusing as this seems in the family of American farmer Roberts, it is all so simple, human and hearty in the best sense that it often reaches a peculiar Hebraic, almost Biblical dignity and is mighty good. This couldn't be without strong acting and vigorous clear-eyed direction. One thing is true, this reviewer thoroughly enjoyed it for its humanity. Its marring title effects it unnecessarily all the way through till we see how it is going to turn out.

The heroine, an American farmer's daughter, brings home a schoolgirl friend. The contrast between these two girls, glimpses of home life, the home-coming party at the farm house, the meeting with the rich man and the engagement in spite of a former lover's protest all remind one of Turgenief, the great Russian novelist, but are as natural as can be. The marriage, his gambling and drinking and her finding him with actresses at a cabaret are American enough. They have a daughter, but her husband's infidelity so works on the woman that she almost drounds herself. Her former lover is a doctor; she goes to him for help and he persuades her to run away with him. Her husband, she says "will never consent to a divorce." The doctor changes his name and telling the world that she is his wife, becomes a famous surgeon. They also have a child. The first child becomes sick and the famous surgeon is consulted. The woman and her other child enter the office and the secret is out. The tragedy is begun and doesn't end even when the doctor dies. There is nothing sentimental in this picture. Americans ought to welcome it as free and independent of convention only as America "itself" is.

STANDARD POLYSCOPE OPENS CLEVELAND OFFICE.

The Standard Polyscope Company, of New York City, which is launching a twenty-eight-reel per week program, has opened executive offices at 547 Leader-News building, Cleveland, for the purpose of handling its exchanges in the surrounding states. The Cleveland exchange location will be selected within a week, and on January 4 the quality of the Standard program can be viewed by exhibitors in the exchange projection room.

Orrin Johnson

ORRIN JOHNSON, who has just been engaged by the B. A. Rolfe Photo Plays, Inc., to play the lead in "Satan Sanderson," the forthcoming Alco release, began his career in the legitimate much earlier than the average actor, and made his success in less time.

Orrin Johnson.

He was born in Louisville, Ky. He went on the stage with Effie Ellsler in 1887. In two months he was leading man. For three seasons he continued with Miss Ellsler as her chief male support.

In 1890 he was engaged by Charles Frohman for the juvenile part in "Men and Women." This was Charles Frohman's original stock company at Proctor's Twenty-third Street Theater. The play ran for one year.

The next season, that of 1892-93, Mr. Johnson created the leading juvenile role in David Belasco's "The Girl I Left Behind Me," with practically the same company. This bill opened the Empire in 1893.

In the fall of 1895, he created the leading juvenile role in A. M. Palmer's production, "The Great Diamond Robbery." In November, 1895, he joined Richard Mansfield as his leading support for the entire Mansfield repertoire.

In the spring of 1899 he played Paris in Maude Adams' all-star production of "Romeo and Juliet." For the last half of this engagement he played Romeo to Miss Adams' Juliet. In 1899-1900 he played the title role in "The Little Minister," with Miss Adams.

At the opening of the season 1900-1901 he joined Annie Russell in "The Royal Family." In 1901-1902 Mr. Johnson continued with Miss Russell, creating the "Judge" in Clyde Fitch's "The Girl and the Judge." He also played the leading juvenile role in "Mice and Men" with Miss Russell.

The young actor was now prepared for stardom. In the latter part of 1904 at Daly's Theater he was starred with Margaret Illington in Onoto Watanna's "The Japanese Nightingale." He was also starred in "Hearts Courageous." In the subsequent season's engagements in the principal roles of "Ben Hur," "The Heart of Maryland" and "The Shepard King" followed.

The entire season of 1907-08 he played the lead in George Bradhurst's "The Man of the Hour." The following season he was featured with Marie Doro in "The Richest Girl."

Mr. Johnson's last work in New York was the creation of the lead in "The Marriage Game," and also that in "The Rule of Three." During his career to date he has played more than two hundred roles.

MAX FIGMAN IN "THE TRUTH WAGON."

Andrew J. Cobe, general manager of the Alliance Films Corporation, makes the announcement that the next Masterpiece Film Company release with Max Figman in the leading part will be "The Truth Wagon."

The production, which is in five parts, is a comedy-drama narrating the adventures of John Ross, an idle son of the rich, who after winning a national reputation of a practical joker, buys the "Truth," a newspaper that will not lie, and proceeds to follow a campaign of truth telling. He finds it a rather novel and difficult experiment. His own father runs for governor on the Republican ticket, but is defeated because his son's paper will not lie. In addition, Ross makes enemies of his friends, overthrows Hammany Hall, ruins himself financially and winds up by falling in love and making his sweetheart's father Governor of the State of New York.

The picture was produced under the personal direction of Mr. Figman, who plays John Ross, the truth teller. Supporting him Lolita Robertson, Al. W. Filson, and H. A. Livingston appear in the principal parts. The scenario was adapted by Elliot J. Clawson from Hayden Talbot's play, while the credit for the excellent photographic results is due to Georges Rizard.

"The Marked Woman"

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

THIS picture, a five-reel offering made by the Peerless studio for the World Film program, shows very able directing. It is a story of the Boxer uprising in China; its heroine is a Russian girl and its hero is an American naval lieutenant who rescues her from the castle of a Boxer prince. The script is by Owen Davis and it was picturized by O. A. C. Lund. The feature of the story is the stirring taking of the Boxer castle by Lieutenant Dare, U. S. N., and his dauntless blue jackets and men in khaki. They have real walls to scale and they go up them in the most approved style. A company of militia artillery, so it seems, was utilized in taking the picture and its big modern field guns are brought into play with thrilling effect. There are also many excellent scenes showing them maneuvering about the fortress and on the way to it. One picture of the guns being dragged across a stream is fine. But the whole offering from first to last is filled with things that will both astonish and please.

The role of the Russian girl, Olga, is taken by Barbara Tennant. Olga is a nihilist and has fallen into the hands of the Russian ambassador (played by R. Radcliffe) at Nankin, who has left her in the keeping of a Chinaman, Kan, played by J. Baker. Prince Ching (Walter Connelly) of the court of the Empress (Jane Stuart) has seen Olga and brings his Boxers to steal her away from Kan's garden. Lieutenant Dare, who has become acquainted with her on her way from Russia to China, is in the garden at the time with the ambassador and Kan. They are captured by Ching. Kan is put in a box with a hole so that he can get food and is, five years later, at the moment when the Boxers really rise, still in his box in a deep dungeon. The American and the Russian ambassador have now been set free by Ching in order to persuade Olga to marry him, and she is now the mother of a child by Ching. A daughter of Kan, whom Ching has blinded with a hot sword, gets Olga to procure the release of her father and he tells the American where Olga is. This brings the attack on the castle, and during it both Ching and the child are killed.

Let us repeat that these Chinese sets and the carefully chosen backgrounds are truly marvelous. Few directors take the trouble to get such perfect setting for their stories. The imperial court, the garden scenes, ocean shores, houses, high walls and courts all are thoroughly Chinese and pleasing. The camera work, too, is of very high quality. The story is not the picture's strongest feature; but by the producer, O. A. C. Lund, it has been made most interesting.

MARY FULLER IN "THE VIRTUOSO."

Mary Fuller enacts the role of a violinist in "The Virtuoso," a Victor one-reel comedy-drama to be released on Monday, December 28. The strains from her violin enchant all her friends and later cause a theatrical manager to fall at her feet in adulation. Mary, however, is in search of an engagement and the manager's proposal comes very much as an anti-climax to her supreme effort to convince him that she ought to be put on the "big time." Comic relief is afforded in abundance in this Victor comedy-drama by means of the introduction of easily recognizable theatrical types.

Helen Gardner

BEAUTIFUL, talented, and of wonderfully convincing dramatic power, Miss Helen Gardner occupies a position distinctively prominent in the motion picture art. An art which reverences for its magnificence.

After graduating from the Sargent Dramatic School, Miss Gardner appeared in several classical pantomimic dramas, but recognizing in the picture play a field in which her highest ideals might be attained, she refused several flattering offers to continue her work behind the footlights, and accepted an offer to become a member of the Vitagraph Players.

Helen Gardner.

After a short absence from this company, during which she appeared in special features, among which were "Cleopatra," "A Princess of Bagdad" and "A Daughter of Pan," Miss Gardner has returned to the Vitagraph Company and is featured in all of the plays written by Mr. Charles L. Gaskill.

Miss Gardner has done more than play the parts assigned to her. She has made a thorough study of the art of silent expression, and has acquired a knowledge of its subtilties, that is evidenced in all of her characterizations. Each character she portrays is a creation with a personality all its own. She is herself only off the screen; on it, she is the personification of the being conceived in the mind of the author.

EDWIN CLARKE VERY ILL.

Edwin Clarke, the popular young Edison player who for the past four years has been associated with that studio, resigned this week because of a serious illness which will require permanent residence in California's mild climate. He had just recently played the Prince in "Fantasma," the Edison feature, which will be released December 19. Though not feeling well at the time, he asked that he might be allowed to portray the forlorn Prince of that delightful fairy tale. His impersonation, as shown in the "Fantasma" film, forms a splendid climax to his long service for the studio and it is remarked by his fellow players as being highly typical, in its boyish, winning grace of manner, of Mr. Clarke's own personality. Julian Reed, his friend for years, took Mr. Clarke to the train, as the representative of the studio to wish him the speediest return to health, for he was beloved by all his co-players.

A LITTLE TOO MUCH REALISM.

All sorts of encounters take place in Van Loan's lively baseball story, "Little Sunset," just completed by Bosworth, Inc. Among them is one in which "Little Sunset" licks the Apaches' former bat-boy in a fair fight, and becomes bat-boy himself. Unfortunately, the boy chosen for the defeat didn't want to be licked, and furthermore he didn't propose to be licked as long as his two fists held out. Gordon Griffith, who plays "Little Sunset," had no intention of being downed, either, especially as the play demanded that he win out. The scene took place at the grounds of the Los Angeles baseball team, with the Bosworth forces as the "Apaches," and the Venice team of the Pacific Coast League as their opponents, the "Renegades." Both teams cheered the combatants to the echo, but to their surprise the fight did not go according to schedule. Holding the boys apart by main strength, Mr. Bosworth explained that it was only make-believe, and that "Little Sunset" should win. "But I kin lick him easy!" howled the other boy. "Can't either," yelled "Sunset," and they were at it again.

And it was only after much persuasion that the two youngsters were willing to call it a play fight and proceed according to the earnest directions of the entire Venice and Bosworth teams.

ON TWO occasions the small boy may whoop outwardly and surely rejoice inwardly—when the circus comes to town and when he is taken to see a cowboy photoplay. The small boy does not know that he is representative of a period in the growth of humankind, when all men were at war with one another, perpetually contending and as perpetually living in a state of dread. The desire to fight that is now being modified in Europe by a process of elimination is warm in the breast of the small boy and never grows entirely cold in man, though it may slumber unnoticed through a lifetime. To see a fight, irrespective of what it is about, is the small boy's delight, and most of all he loves to see the action on horseback. Therein lies the fascination of cowboy plays for minds that are primitive, and they are not always the minority in a mixed audience.

Two-Gun Hicks is the hero he always was, a cool, insolent, steely-eyed man—nearly all gun men have grey blue eyes—who seldom shoots, but when he pulls there is nearly always something doing. He is not first to reach shanty town. He is preceded by Bad Ike on a rampage. Bad Ike is seen coming down the hill, blazing away with both hands and boiling drunk. The inhabitants run to shelter—men in the saloon rush to cover; even the dance hall girls hide. Bad Ike terrorizes the other four-flushers with his guns for a while, then rounds them all up at the bar for a drink. Two-Gun Hicks happens along, and he comes unannounced. The shanty town is deserted when he rides in, but he lights a match with one hand, snipping the end with his nails, glances around with a sneer and walks into the bar. He pounds the table and orders a drink. "Who the —— are you?" demands Bad Ike, unwilling to have any other rooster in his barnyard. The stranger walks straight up to the bad man, looking him in the eye, and says, "I'm Two-Gun Hicks," and he proves it by drawing swiftly and shooting Bad Ike in the wrist. This is a mere pleasantry, however, as a round of drinks follows, and the two bad men become good friends.

Two-Gun Hicks spurns the advances of the dance girls. "When I want a woman, I take her," he affirms, "but I don't care to have 'em hanging round." Mr. Hicks takes a fancy to May Jenks, the wife of a confirmed drunkard, but she fails to reciprocate. She even goes so far as to urge her renegade mate to chase Hicks out of town. The gambler also backs this up for purposes of his own and not particularly honorable. As a consequence, Mr. Hicks is told to quit at 5 p. m. or take what is coming to him from the outraged, though alcoholic, husband. The wife, who has called Hicks a coward, now fears for her husband's life and seeks out Hicks to plead with him. He decides to prove that he is no moral coward. He braves the sneers and jeers of the crowd by quitting at the appointed time, though he slaps the gambler in the face with his gloves as a parting blow. Virtue triumphs in the person of May Jenks and her triumphant mate invites the crowd to celebrate.

"When Wealth Aspired"

Three-Reel Offering by Italian Pathe Company in Which Wealthy Parents Buy Titled Husband for Daughter.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

THE distinguishing features of this three-reel picture, "When Wealth Aspired," are the dignified acting, full of repose yet clearly picturing mental states to us, and also the convincing direction in most of its scenes. The sets are all that one would expect in a picture by a skillful director, and the camera work makes it all clear. It is a story of Italian society life and its heroine, the daughter of wealthy but rather vulgar parents, is married off to a duke, her dot being sufficient to fill the impoverished aristocrat's needs. Her father's secretary loves her and he finds the note of the duke to the marriage broker agreeing to pay a large sum after the marriage. This note he takes to the girl's father and protests that he will tell the girl. Her father writes to the duke and asks what ought to be done. We have been shown that the duke is a dead shot with a revolver. He picks a quarrel with the young man and shoots him dead.

The secretary has written a note to the girl to be given her after his death, but for five years this lies lost, and in the meanwhile the girl seems to be getting on very well with her husband. Then the secretary's mother brings her the long lost letter, from which she learns that the young man had loved her and that his death had been at heart and in its purpose little else than murder. The duchess determines to be revenged on her husband. A certain prince is paying court to her and he is as expert a swordsman as the duke is a sure shot. At a dinner in her own house she, the prince being present, gives her husband a carefully calculated insult—we have never seen anything just like this scene in pictures. Another duel, this time between the prince and the duke, is the outcome. The prince writes telling her that he will let the duke kill him if she wants him to—the duke intercepts the letter going in to her—and she answers: "Defend yourself." The duke intercepts her letter going out and knows her answer, yet he sends it on. The duel is fought and he is brought home dying, but before he goes, she shows him the letter of the young secretary whom he had killed in a dual.

There are plenty of things in the story and its direction that are wholly fresh; it was not copied after other pictures and the art of it is unmistakable. As is plain from the outline of the story, the author's object was not a very high one; but the picture puts that object over relentlessly. It is probable that the more intelligent audiences will like the offering better than those in rough districts. It is unusual and will make a very fair offering at worst.

The Motion Picture Exhibitor

NATIONAL LEAGUE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE.

Holds Meeting in New York to Discuss Organization Matters—May Select Place for Next Convention.

THE National Executive Board of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League convened at the McAlpin Hotel on Monday, December 7, and are still in session as this edition is going to press.

The meeting was called to order by National President Marion S. Pearce. The following members of the board were in attendance: M. E. Cory, vice-president, of San Francisco; W. R. Wilson, secretary, Columbus, O.; Peter J. Jeup, national treasurer, Detroit; Fulton Brylawski, national committeeman, Washington, D. C., and T. P. Finnegan, vice-president, from Dallas, Tex., by proxy (Mr. Pearce).

The board went carefully over the report of the special convention committee having charge of the last annual convention at Dayton. The board found that every penny of the funds was fully accounted for and the detailed report which was submitted was characterized as eminently satisfactory. The president, secretary and treasurer submitted their reports, which show that a great deal of good work has been accomplished. Reports from the various state organizations show new interest and enthusiasm, which can doubtlessly be traced to the good work accomplished by Mr. Pearce and Mr. Brylawski in securing a reduction of the war tax at Washington.

The matter of the amalgamation of the factions in the state of New York next occupied the attention of the committee. Exhibitors of the city and the state of New York representing all shades of opinion and affiliated with both organizations in the state appeared before the board and were listened to with the closest attention. The members of the board showed a very deep interest in the question of bringing the factions together in amicable and harmonious fashion. Owing to the bad telephone service with the cities up-state on account of the storm, it was impossible to arrive at any definite conclusion, but it is the settled belief of every member of the committee that a complete and permanent harmonization is a certainty in the immediate future.

At the end of the second day's session the question of selecting the city for the holding of the next national convention and exposition was taken up, Mr. Cory leading off with a very earnest and eloquent appeal on behalf of San Francisco. The selection for the next convention will be an accomplished fact when this issue reaches the readers.

There is much unfinished and important business before the committee, which expects to remain in session for the rest of this week.

PATERSON EXHIBITORS ORGANIZE.

Silk City Picture Men Will Hold Weekly Meeting—Officers Elected—Maintenance Levy Decided Upon.

MANAGERS and representatives of the various motion picture houses of Paterson, N. J., seeking to accomplish a general betterment of the moving picture business in that city, formed a permanent organization of the trade, called the Moving Picture Exhibitors' Association of Patterson, last week, at a meeting held in the Lyric theater, that city. The meetings of the new organization will be held weekly, when topics looking to the mutual advancement of the picture show business will be discussed.

The following were elected officers to serve in their respective capacities during the ensuing year: Charles L. Dooley, manager of the Regent theater, president; George W. Cuff, representing the Silk City Amusement Company, controlling the Grand theater, vice-president; William Hewitt, manager of the Regal theater, secretary, and Max Gold, representing the Sterling Amusement Company, controlling the Strand theater, treasurer. Initiation fees were paid in, and a regular sustaining assessment, to be paid quarterly, was determined upon.

FRISCO'S FILM BOARD SUCCESS.

Has Opened Offices in Merchants' National Bank Building—Explains in Letter Purpose of Organization.

THE Film Exchange Board of Trade of San Francisco, with which every exchange in the city is affiliated, is meeting with great success with its work and most exhibitors are in hearty accord with its aims. Offices have been fitted up in the Merchants' National Bank Building, adjoining the offices of Maurice L. Asher, attorney-at-law and secretary of the organization, these being in charge of R. E. Stebbins, manager of the Board of Trade. The following letter was sent to exhibitors under the date of November 24:

"Inasmuch as there has been considerable comment on, and speculation regarding, for what purpose the Film Exchange Board of Trade of San Francisco was formed, we wish to explain for your information that it was organized for the purpose of bettering the conditions of both exhibitors and exchanges.

"By our rules regarding collections, which must be adhered to by all theaters, we have so arranged matters to protect the established and dependable exhibitors from the fly-by-night and irresponsible exhibitor, who comes into your locality and, by defrauding as many film exchanges as he can, lives for weeks, sometimes for months, on business that should justly belong to the established and honest exhibitor.

"The Film Exchange Board of Trade simply desires to have film and poster service paid promptly, as heretofore specified, and we will work together with the exhibitor to make conditions more satisfactory and your business more successful than has been the case during the past three or four years. There has been no combination formed for the purpose of raising the prices of film service, and it will be our desire and aim, in all future procedure, to work to the betterment of the entire trade. To this end, we respectfully solicit and desire the co-operation and support of every honest well intentioned exhibitor who desires to see the standard of the business raised in all its branches."

"SAFETY FIRST" RULES IN CLEVELAND.

In pursuing a policy in accord with the rules and regulations laid down by city and state officials for the proper protection of theaters, Cleveland, Ohio, exhibitors have adopted a list of "safety first" instructions to govern operators. The rules are as follows:

"Reading or smoking in the booth is strictly prohibited (60 per cent. of booth fires are traceable to the infraction of this rule).

"No visitors allowed in the booth at any time. (Owing to strictures placed upon us of a mandatory nature by the authorities we cannot risk forfeiting our license.)

"No apprentice or 'permit' man shall be deemed eligible to operate at this theater until he has passed a successful examination by a joint board of examiners, composed of three licensed union operators and three practical members of Cleveland Local No. 1, Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America.

"All union apprentices, enrolled in any operators' union, as such, shall pay to the Cleveland Local No. 1, Motion Picture Exhibitors' League, a fee of fifty dollars.

"Substitute operators must report at least one hour before the opening time of the show, in order to familiarize themselves with the plant. This is absolutely necessary as a precaution against accidents, stoppages and fires, which are liable to occur to a man 'new on the job.'

"The manager of this theater must always be consulted for permission to send a substitute operator in place of the regular man.

"The practice of one operator working 'double shift' in downtown theaters will not be tolerated, except in extreme cases of sickness, death or urgent circumstances. (Eight hours being the maximum time for one man's labor under our rules and under the state laws.)

"The manager of this theater reserves the right, whenever the operator fails to open the show on schedule time, or fails to put on a satisfactory show, to engage any other qualified operator holding a city license."

Says Lillian to Lewis

"I Don't Like Your Style of Beauty; Have Some of My Beautifiers"—Ask the World Film Press Agent If You're a Skeptic.

ONE of the best little things we do at the World office is to take care of the overworked press agent; he is our joy. The weird tales he brings us are gems of literature, masterpieces of imagination. It is our constant regret that we cannot always find space to print all that is offered—some room must be reserved for the advertising department—and much that is wonderful and wise must needs be consigned to the wastepaper basket. Yet, there are times when we are constrained to give space to otherwise immaterial matter because of its peculiar application, and that observation brings us to the explanation of the heading of this yarn. Here's the answer:

Lillian Russell.

Rumor had gone forth that Lewis J. Selznick was looking worried under the strain of business occasioned by the constant amount of work constantly piling up around him. According to the able press agent, we called on Mr. Selznick to inquire as to the reason and this is what the interview revealed

Remarking Mr. Selznick's unexpected youthful appearance and a decided transformation in his facial aspect he refused to catch the compliment and evasively proceeded in this wise:

"Yes, sir; the World Film Corporation's business is expanding so rapidly that we are obliged to take another floor in this building for the New York Exchange on the street level. Our branches are increasing each week——"

"Increased business is responsible, then, for this youthful and comely appearance of yours, Mr. Selznick?"

Ignoring the question, Mr. Selznick proceeded: "I am constantly gathering new Broadway stars into our fold. Lew Fields is my latest catch."

"You have other great features coming?"

"Yes; on December 21st, Alice Brady in 'As Ye Sow' and on December 28th, Wilton Lackaye and Gail Kane in 'The Pit.' Isn't that enough to make me feel good."

"You are justified in feeling good, Mr. Selznick," we ventured, "but you look so uncommonly well rejuvenated, if we may so say, that we are curious as to the cause."

Lewis J. Selznick.

"Then comes Beatriz Michelena in two of her great successes, 'Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch' and 'Mignon.'"

"And Lillian Russell?"

"Yes, and Miss Russell in 'Wildfire,' continued Mr. Selznick. "You will remember——"

Here we became slightly inquisitive.

"Miss Russell's beautifiers are said to be very potent in their effects," we hazarded.

Mr. Selznick coughed and blushed slightly.

"That program will take us," he hastened, "well into the new year, my plans for which are well under way. Then——"

"Excuse me, Mr. Selznick," we persisted, "are Miss Russell's beautifying preparations responsible for this wonderful change in your facial appearance?"

"Well, really, now——"

"It's a personal question," we remarked, "but a legitimate one in the circumstances."

Mr. Selznick laughed good naturedly.

"I'm afraid," he began——

"I won't publish the fact," we said, "if it is distasteful."

"It is not;" he smiled. "You've discovered my secret, so I may as well 'fess up. Miss Russell did make me a present of a case of her celebrated beautifying preparations, and between that and the phenomenal success of the World Film Corporation's business, you cannot be surprised that I feel and look good, can you?"

Of course, we could not, and said so.

There, you have it—the consummation of the desire of the press agent, to mention the names of Mr. Selznick and Miss Russell in the same story. We throw in the cuts for good measure.

OKLAHOMA EXHIBITORS' NOTICE.

Oklahoma Exhibitors, it is to be hoped that you paid your war tax promptly within the time proscribed (November), otherwise you will have a penalty of fifty per cent. added. Uncle Sam never does things by halves, and in this instance, he has no intention of overlooking anyone. When it became necessary to raise the war tax, Congress at once decided that theater proprietors should contribute liberally. The first declaration was, that all theaters, large and small throughout the United States, should pay $100, this amount was finally reduced to a minimum of $25, graduating from that to $100, according to seating capacity for each theater.

The Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, through our President, Mr. Pearce, Mr. Fulton Brylawski and others, worked untiringly with the congressional committee, and were finally successful in having the tax reduced. It looks as though this one act would be sufficient recommendation that every exhibitor in the United States would be desirous of having his name placed on the rolls of an organization that is continually working for the betterment of the motion picture industry. Remember, there is not only national legislation, but state legislation, that is continually being projected by persons who are not financially interested in the business. The following, which I clipped from the Daily Oklahoman of this date, is self-explanatory:

"Oklahoma State School Superintendent, R. H. Wilson, makes recommendation to new Governor and Legislature that a more rigid censorship be required of all Moving Picture Shows which school children are permitted to see, and that nothing of a licentious or outlawry nature shall be shown before children of a school age."

The moral is, "Join the Oklahoma State League." Do not shift your responsibility. If you cannot look after your own interests, contribute your mite in dues to some one that will.

UNCLE SAM CONTRACTS FOR GEORGE KLEINE ATTRACTIONS.

George Kleine's New York offices report the completion of a contract whereby the United States Coast Artillery Corps, stationed at Fort Terry, N. Y., will see all Kleine attractions. Starting with "Quo Vadis," one subject each week will be projected for eight consecutive weeks. Fort Terry is located at the lower end of Long Island, where soldiers are constantly on guard duty and where a considerable force of men is regularly stationed. All the better class of motion picture programs in New York were considered before the officers in charge definitely decided in favor of the Kleine attractions.

"Her Younger Sister"

Reviewed by James S. McQuade.

THE Beauty film, "Her Youngest Sister," directed by Frank Cooley, recommends itself by a pleasing little story and fine photography. It is of a different type from that which we have been accustomed to see under the Beauty brand, and, naturally, one will miss Marguerite Fischer in the cast, although it is capably sustained by Fred Gamble, Gladys Kingsbury, Charlotte Burton and Joseph Harris.

Old Bill Lyons (Fred Gamble) is a grumpy old father who suffers from a combination of various ailments that confine him to his room most of the time. Emma (Miss Kingsbury), his elder daughter, is his obedient slave, attending to his selfish whims continually without a murmur. She is loved by a wholesome young man, John Wyman (Joseph Harris), who asks for her hand from the irrascible father, but is snubbed and given the ultimatum that he and Emma must wait ten years. John leaves in a rage, because Emma consents to the sacrifice without remonstrance.

Ten years pass and John returns to claim his old sweetheart. He is met at the door of Emma's home by a beautiful young woman whom he greets with great warmth, believing her to be Emma. Instead it is Emma's sister Elsie (Miss Burton), who has budded into glorious womanhood in the past ten years. When he does meet Emma one can see that his heart is already centered on her beautiful younger sister. Soon Emma becomes aware of the fact and she returns her engagement ring to John, much to the delight of selfish old Bill Lyons, who inconsiderately tells her that Elsie is the only girl for John. The release date is December 15.

A BIG "EDISON NIGHT."

Manager Balsdon of the Dyckman Theater at 207th street and Broadway was so pleased with the success of an "Edison night" held recently at his other theatre, the Regent, that he repeated it at the Dyckman Tuesday night. Despite the inclement weather, the faithful fans were there in such numbers that before 9 o'clock the doors had to be closed. The program was exclusively Edison, featuring Augustus Phillips in the dashing "Midnight Ride of Paul Revere"; also shown were "Bootle's Baby," "The Everlasting Triangle" and "Two's Company."

When the stars who appeared in the films were introduced from the stage they were given an ovation, the girls of the party each receiving a huge bouquet. Manager Horace G. Plimpton occupied a box with the Edison players: Miss Viola Dana, Miss Gladys Huelette, Miss Mabel Trunnelle, Robert Conness, Herbert Prior and Augustus Phillips. Manager Balsdon tendered the party a banquet at the Hotel Cecil after the performance.

"The Thief"

Henri Bernstein's Tense Play, Picturized in Five Parts by Box Office Attractions Company, Makes Unusually Strong Offering.

Reviewed by Hanford C. Judson.

FEW plays lend themselves so whole heartedly to picturization as Henri Bernstein's "The Thief." It is a play in which the plot has been knit with extreme care, and its object is the plot, the situation and the emotions that spring from it, rather than poetry or atmosphere, so that the picture, since it has been able to make this situation absolutely clear, loses but a modicum of the appeal that the stage version made. It utilizes the advantage the screen has over the stage of telling its story more directly and perhaps it gains as much as it loses. It appeals to this reviewer—speaking of it as a production that gets its purpose over—as the strongest picture he has seen in a long while.

The staging is rather bare, as though done in a cramped studio, but this is no hinderance to it, for Director Edgar Lewis and his players, headed by Dorothy Donnelly, had a story that needed the best art to make it effective on the screen, but with that art, required no other embellishment. The staging serves, for as produced and acted the story would have made itself felt in much poorer sets. The director and every one of his players can well be proud of this picture. Dorothy Donnelly plays Marie Landau, in love with Richard Voysin, an admirer of pretty frocks. He and she are comparatively poor, now married and living with the Legardes (E. L. Davenport and Ivy Shepard). Legardes, a remarried widower, has a son, Fernand, the pride of his heart (Harry Spingler). The boy, impressionable and flighty, has fallen madly in love with Marie, who hardly flirts with him. But she, to get the pretty dresses she thinks she needs, is stealing from her friend, Mrs. Legardes. A detective (George De Carlton) is brought in as a guest. This man knows that Fernand has been living a free life in Paris and watches him closely. He has marked some bills. He sees the boy in the part of the house where these are and finds at once that they are gone.

Marie knows that the thief is to be named in an hour, is waiting in suspense, and is surprised to hear the detective state that the boy is the culprit. He is out on the lawn and she asks permission to go for him. She has the bills with her, and telling the boy all the truth, persuades him to take them and shoulder the whole guilt, which he Quixotically does. From this situation on, the picture changes a little from the original story; but it has that fine scene in which Marie's husband discovers the truth and the scene in which she finally confesses to the family. It can truly be called a big feature offering.

Aaron A. Corn, a well-known exhibitor and owner of several theaters in this city, a prominent figure in the New York group of organized exhibitors, has sold out his interest in the theaters and has become associated with the Eclectic Exchange in this city. MARGARET VALE IN PICTURES.

Margaret Vale, niece of President Wilson, made her debut in motion pictures, in a sensational manner last week, by appearing in the scene at Marble Hill Cliff, an eighty-five foot eminence overlooking the Harlem River, into which jumped Barney McPhee, the leading man of the I. S. P. Producing Company.

Miss Vale, who in private life is Mrs. Howe, wife of the Professor of Latin at the University of North Carolina, has the sanction of her uncle in her professional career, as illustrated by a letter received from the President recently, in which he warmly wished her all success in her venture.

Last season Miss Vale's work in "Omar, the Tent Maker," in spectacular drama she quickly graduated from a minor part to that of leading woman. The production in which she is now appearing is "Was He a Coward?" and is in four parts. The scene that occasioned the daring leap from the lofty craig represents an incident in the escape of the hero, a convict. At this height and on this dizzy edge Miss Vale, as the heroine, pleads with the hero not to brave the icy depths, and almost slips into the water herself.

McPhee, watched by a batallion of reporters and newspaper photographers, made the leap in good style and swam a considerable distance with his clothes almost frozen to him.

Fire Prevention Discussed

Association Debates Construction and Operation of Houses —To Resuscitate Defeated Bill Governing Erection of Theaters.

MOVING picture interests came in for a good deal of discussion from various angles at the meeting of the Kentucky State Fire Prevention Association in Louisville December 4. The meeting was held at the Seelbach Hotel, that city.

Regulation of the building and operation of picture theaters was emphasized in a number of talks, Secretary Frank M. Drake stating that a bill covering these phases had lost out at the 1914 session of the state legislature, but would be brought up again in 1916. He said that much of the publicity work of the organization from now on would be in the direction of educating the public about the necessity of attending only theaters which are properly built.

C. C. Bosworth, state fire marshal of Kentucky, who was present, said that though the law referred to failed, he would begin a system of supervision immediately after the first of the year, when additional funds become available, and that everything possible would be done to make the picture shows safe.

From the positive standpoint—regarding the matter of regulation as negative—several interesting suggestions were made. The fire marshal said that one of the methods he is using to instruct his inspectors in proper methods of operating moving picture machines and the theaters generally is to have talks given by experts with a properly equipped theater as a model. He said that recently at a conference in Lexington, Ky., of his deputies, W. J. Gilsdorf, a fire insurance man, spoke about moving picture hazards, and took the deputies to a modern theater in Lexington and pointed out to them the methods in use there for safeguarding the house.

Ralph E. Richman, secretary of the state fire marshal department of Indiana, was a speaker at the meeting, and declared that by means of co-operation with moving picture men he had been able to get a great deal of desirable publicity along fire prevention lines. The moving picture film, "The Crime of Carelessness," made for the National Association of Manufacturers, has been shown generally in the Indiana houses at the request of the department, he said, the operators being asked to use the film in connection with their regular programs on days when the Indiana Fire Prevention Association, which inspects a town every month, meets there. In this way, he said, the minds of the people were turned toward fire prevention topics in a very effective way, and he praised the picture theater owners heartily for their public spirit in showing the films and thus giving publicity to a most important proposition.

Alco Absorbs All Star

Harry R. Raver and Augustus Thomas Dispose of Their Holdings in the Feature Company.

THE Alco Film Corporation this week absorbed the All Star Feature Corporation, of which Harry R. Raver was president and Augustus Thomas director general. Mr. Raver and Mr. Thomas have disposed of their holdings. The purchase of the All Star carries to the Alco the equipment, contracts, play options and good will of the company. The All Star was under contract to furnish the Alco with one release a month, and this will be carried out. The releasing and distributing arrangements at present in force will be continued.

Under the new plan George Foster Platt, formerly chief producer at the New Theater, will be the director general of All Star. Shortly after Alco's reorganization many plays were bought and options secured on considerable literary material. Contracts were also signed with stars. It is intimated that these will be utilized speedily and the pictures produced under the All Star brand.

GOVERNMENT "TRUST" SUIT RESUMED.

The Government suit against the so-called moving picture trust, hearings in which have been held off and on for the past two years, was resumed in the United States District Court in Philadelphia on December 7. Edwin Grosvenor, special assistant to Attorney General Gregory, began argument for the dissolution of the alleged combination. It was expected that the proceedings would last three or four days.

There are thirteen corporations and eleven defendants named in the suit, all of them having to do or having had to do with the so-called licensed group.

Sawyer Increases Capital

Move Made Necessary by Increases in Business—Has New Name.

Forced to extend its operations by the large increase in business, which the last few weeks have witnessed, A. H. Sawyer, Inc., has increased its corporate capitalization to $600,000, according to papers filed with the Secretary of State, which also altered the name to Sawyer Film Corporation. For weeks a group of prominent downtown bankers have been urging Sawyer to increase capitalization and expand its business accordingly, and this group are now ready to take the stock which can be offered under the company's capital stock increase.

Sawyer, Inc., during the six months of its corporate existence, has made remarkable strides. Beginning with a comparatively small capital, it has kept its money turning over so fast that now it controls the world marketing rights to fifty features, and has branch offices in the twenty-five most important film centers of the country. Its international expansion has been arranged for through a contract just signed with one of the leading cinema concerns in London, which will handle Great Britain and all the British colonies, except Canada, for the Sawyer features.

One of the new policies of Sawyer, after enlargement, will be the outright purchase of negatives, and also the financing of producing companies releasing exclusively through it, by making advances on royalty when a picture is turned over for marketing. By being able to direct the producing work of its companies, Sawyer will be able to insure a better quality of film, and obtain just the sort of features which its zone offices demand.

The new Sawyer Film Corporation will doubtless be one of the strongest concerns in the field, because its branch office affiliations are as strong as any in the business, and it has an assured supply of big films that will surely hold the public confidence it has already won. A. H. Sawyer, the commanding genius of the enterprise from the start, is confident that this policy of expansion is wise, because he has fully tested out the market and his marketing plans, and having made a success from the very start, he feels that it is time to go out and conquer an even wider field.

EDISON NATIONAL KINDERGARTEN PICTURE APPROVED.

Miss Bessie Locke, corresponding secretary of the National Kindergarten Association, accompanied by twenty heads of departments, were invited guests at the Edison Studio recently to pass judgment upon the new picture, "Uncle Crusty," soon to be released. "Uncle Crusty," in pleasing story form, was produced with the collaboration of the Kindergarten Association to acquaint a greater public with the many benefits of the Kindergarten and its influence, thereby trusting that great good will be further accomplished when more know of its wonderful scope.

All of the Kindergartners were enthusiastic in their commendation of the picture. "Uncle Crusty," by Miss Violet Pike, tells of a crusty old gentleman who was tantalized by a youngster's affections, finally by his coldness causing the child to wander off where she somes upon a kindergarten school. Then are shown the children in all their charming instructive play games which make the kindergarten beloved by children. The several scenes were furnished by the St. Mary's Kindergarten of Brooklyn, and no more spell-bound audience ever gathered than the children at the Studio "seeing themselves."

CAMERAGRAPH CLUB GIVES PARTY.

A pleasurable package party was given at Eldert Hall in Brooklyn Saturday evening, December 5, under the auspices of the Cameragraph Club. It was an unqualified success. The Cameragraph Club is composed of the foreman of each factory department of the Nicholas Power Company and other executives. Mr. Power was present and made a speech praising the work of the foremen of his organization. He was followed by Mr. Cassard who, speaking for the assembly, thanked Mr. Power for his kind expressions and voiced the appreciation of the club for his untiring interest in the welfare of his men. Speeches were also made by Mr. Uhlemann, the superintendent, and Mr. Ray Dengel, the chairman of the entertainment committee. Refreshments and dancing were enjoyed until a late hour. The officers of the club are: Theodore Uhlemann, president; H. Tonnerson, vice-president; S. S. Cassard, treasurer, and A. J. Lang, secretary. Honorary members of the club are Mr. Power, Edward Earl, J. F. Skerrett and Will C. Smith.

"The Conspiracy."

Robert Emerson Does Good Work in The Famous Players' Four-Part Adaptation of Stage Success.

Reviewed by George Blaisdell.

IT IS a good detective photoplay in which John Emerson makes his bow to the picture public. Likewise "The Conspiracy" marks the first of the Famous Players' productions "presented" by Charles Frohman, in accordance with the alliance recently announced between the play producer and the picture manufacturer. The adaptation of this stage success of Robert B. Baker and Mr. Emerson is in four parts. Mr. Emerson is seen to advantage as Winthrop Clavering, the eccentric author of stories of crime and criminals and also the unraveler of mysteries. He is backed by a cast, the member of which furnish good character portrayals. Among the best of these is the work of the unnamed player, who appears early in the story as the criminal arrested by the police and subjected to the third degree.

Lois Meredith has the part of Margaret Holt, the country girl who comes to the city to visit her brother, an assistant district attorney fighting the Scarlet Band, but is misled into accompanying a woman of more than doubtful character and held a prisoner for several days. Francis Byrne is Victor Holt, the brother of Margaret, who aids the police in trying to round up the criminals. Harold Lockwood is the newspaper reporter who, in his hunt for a story, gets mixed up in the kidnapping of Holt and also falls in love with Margaret.

The story carries a vein of comedy, although at no time is it pronounced. The chief value of the piece lies in the work of Mr. Emerson, who is seen in a role which on the stage he created and of which he makes much. The picture will interest steadily. There are situations that stand out, as, for instance, when Margaret, who, in order to learn something of the workings of the band, has secured a position as stenographer for Morton, kills the head of the outlaws when she is assailed. The scene in the police station when the arrested man is cross-examined and pestered is well handled. The only love element comes just at the ending of the story.

CRANE WILBUR ON TOUR.

Crane Wilbur, who for four years has been appearing in Pathe productions and more recently in Eclectic's "Perils of Pauline," is now for the season of 1914-15 on a personal tour of the country, appearing at the head of his own company. Mr. Wilbur is said to have been playing to capacity audiences, with record-breaking return dates. Charles F. Atkinson, manager Quincy Adams Sawyer, 211 Tremont street, Boston, will be glad to furnish all details as to Mr. Wilbur's tour.

WHERE IS GRACE ADAMS?

The friends of Miss J. Grace Adams, a New York girl, who is believed to have joined a motion picture producing company, are seeking information regarding her. Miss Adams was last heard from at Edmonton, Alberta, about four months ago. Information may be addressed to her brother, Sam Eckstein, 107 East 108th street, New York.

Florence Nash.

FLORENCE NASH, now playing the lead with the Life Photo Film Corporation, is the daughter of the late Philip F. Nash, theatrical man, so it seems only natural that Miss Nash should turn to the stage. She has been equally successful in singing and dramatic companies and in vaudeville.

Miss Nash began her stage career with a short season in stock. Then came the first of her distinctive character creations. She made an instant hit as the lisping girl in "The Boys of Company B." The lisp became exceedingly popular and so she transferred it to "Miss Hook of Holland," a musical comedy.

Florence Nash.

Engagements in "The Algerian," a soubrette role with De Wolf Hopper and an engagement in "When Sweet Sixteen" followed. Shortly after this she was promoted to the honors of leading woman to Thomas W. Ross, supporting him effectively in "An Everyday Man." The vaudeville claimed Miss Nash's attention next. She was popular over a wide stretch of country in the sketch "In 1999," a laughing comedy.

Next Miss Nash returned to the legitimate. In "Within the Law" there was an opportunity which the management felt was not to be overlooked, and she created in that part, a world wide reputation, as one of the cleverest actresses on the American stage.

D'ARCY LECTURES ON PICTURES.

On Thanksgiving Eve, H. A. D'Arcy, publicity man of the Lubin company, delivered a lecture to 500 members of the National Commercial Gas Association at the Y. M. C. A. building in Philadelphia. Mr. D'Arcy described the origin, the evolution and development of photo motion. The audidence gave earnest attention to the speech and rewarded the reader with considerable applause. After the lecture Mr. D'Arcy, by request, read his famous poem, "The Face Upon the Floor."

GEORGE TUCKER SUCCEEDING IN ENGLAND.

The latest of the subjects produced by George Tucker, with the London Film Company, bears the individual stamp of this successful director. "Called Back," the London's four-part adaptation of Hugh Conway's famous novel, which is being booked in this country by Cosmofotofilm, is a strong production. Mr. Tucker's "Traffic in Souls," produced by him from the pen of Walter Macnamara while with the Universal, was one of the biggest moneymakers ever thrown on the screen. Mr. Tucker has had many successful pictures while with the London Film, but some of the best of these, representing his later work, have not been shown in the United States. Among these are "The Prisoner of Zenda," which will not be exhibited here. It is said to be probable that its sequel, "Rupert of Hentzau," will come over. These have won high praise from those who have seen them, and will be released when conditions improve in Great Britain. Mr. Tucker has also turned out three three-reelers having to do with the war—"1914," by Rita; "Stragglers" and "In His Majesty's Service." While these have been extensively booked in England as high-priced features, it is possible on account of their war flavor they may not come here.

A recent letter from the producer to a friend stated that he is most happily situated in England, but the lure of the old U. S. A. is beginning to make itself manifest. He feels that in the time he has been abroad he has materially grown in a producing way. He has been compelled to make pictures that would compete in the world's markets, and he has won out in marked degree.

Manufacturers' Advance Notes

"WHEN THE BLIND SEE" (Lubin).

A very excellent story, written by Will M. Ritchey, one of the many writers of the Lubin California studio. Two brothers, Joe and Edwin, are sons of John Green, a well-to-do farmer. The father favors Joe, the elder, because he shows the greater business ability, and gives him a clear title to the property. On the death of the father, Joe asserts his claim and tells his brother to clear out and shift for himself. Ruth, the sister, goes with Edwin to battle with the world. The girl by work is the main support and enables her brother to pursue scientific study. Years pass and Joe has struck oil on the ranch and becomes very rich. Edwin in turn has graduated from medical college and perfected an extraordinary and successful operation on the eyes. In the height of Joe's prosperity he develops temporary blindness. A famous specialist is sent for and the brothers recognize each other. Joe's eyesight being restored, he makes atonement for the past. L. C. Shumway, William Parsons and Velma Whitman play the leading roles.

LIFE PHOTO WILL MAKE FIVE-PART FEATURES.

The Life Photo Film Corporation will shortly announce a succession of five-part feature releases, adaptations from stage plays, options having been secured by them on twelve of the greatest dramatic success produced in this country.

The Life Photo Film Corporation, beginning with the month of January, will produce two five-part features a month. As to whether this additional feature will be released under the Life Photo brand has not as yet been determined by the directors of that company. It is possible that the additional program will be released under another name, although the productions will be managed by the same executive staff and forces that are engaged with the Life Photo Film Corporation.

ESSANAY PLAYERS IN NEW YORK.

Miss Beverly Bayne, Miss Helen Dunbar and Thomas Commerford left for New York today (Saturday, Dec. 5), where they will join Francis X. Bushman, who went to Boston and New York earlier in the week to take scenes in Essanay's new photoplay "Graustark," by George Barr McCutcheon.

Francis X. Bushman will play the leading role, that of Grenfall Lorry, the young American, who falls in love with a princess of "Graustark." Miss Bayne will be the Princess Yvonne and Thomas Commerford and Miss Dunbar will take the parts of her uncle and aunt, who are traveling through America with her.

The scene in which Lorry rushes to New York to get a last glimpse of his princess, of whose rank he is entirely ignorant, will be taken on the wharves of the Atlantic liners to make it absolutely true to the story.

The players will then go to Washington, where all the scenes that took place there in the story will be reproduced with exactness to the text. Other scenes will be taken on the very line Lorry met the princess traveling from Denver to New York by way of Washington. Pictures also will be taken of the thrilling night ride by coach at breakneck speed over the doubtful roads winding in and about the foothills of the Alleghanies, in which Lorry and the princess catch a train which had pulled out without them. This will show the picturesque scenery along the Ohio River valley, where the roads wind along the river banks at perilously dizzy heights and with nothing but a few feet between the traveler and a drop of hundreds of feet over a steep embankment.

ALLIANCE PROGRAM ENTERS THE NORTHWEST.

The Alliance Films Corporation has just completed negotiations with the Progressive Investment Co., of Portland, Oregon, to handle the Alliance programme in the States of Washington, Oregon, Montana, Idaho, Wyoming, Colorado, Utah, and New Mexico.

The Progressive Investment Co. is owned and operated by Ray Grombacher and Frank Bailey, who are two of the original film men in the Mountain and Northwest territory. They have built up one of the largest film businesses in the West.

With this addition to the list of exchanges the Alliance is now at the service of nearly every exhibitor in the United States and Canada.

UNITED FILM SERVICE IN TOLEDO.

The United Film Service has established a branch office in Toledo, Ohio. The new exchange is located at 413 Summit street, and is in charge of Bert Diener. Expansion of business has dictated the establishment of the new office, which brings the list of United Film Service exchanges up to forty-three.

"THE JEWEL OF ALLAH" (Eclair).

A film filled with the mystic atmosphere and gorgeous splendor of the orient is that released by Eclair on Sunday December 20, entitled "The Jewel of Allah." This one-reel mystery drama is a jewel in settings, story and portrayal and it takes the audience from a palace in the far East to the great metropolis where the wonderful jewel of Allah finally comes into its own. Two favorite Eclair players are featured in the leading roles; namely, Edna Payne and Stanley Walpole, and their work will be a delight to their large following of movie fans.

"THE BIG SISTER'S CHRISTMAS" (Rex Universal).

"The Big Sister's Christmas" is a timely Yuletide photodrama in two reels. Anna Little and Herbert Rawlinson enact the leading roles. It will be released under the Rex (Universal) brand on Thursday, December 24. Ruth Ann Baldwin's scenario is crammed as full as Willie Jones' stocking of a Christmas morning with the spirit of Christmas. Moreover, she has written a charming tribute to that much neglected family institution, the "big sister," with which every large household is familiar.

The play itself is chock-a-block with Christmas color and Scene from "The Big Sister's Christmas" (Rex).

Christmas trees decorated with baubles of all the hues of the rainbow. In giving it the flavor of the approaching holidays Anna Little and Herbert Rawlinson have more than done their share. In addition the photodrama gives one glimpses of Settlement House social life and introduces the types of ambitious East Siders who attend the self-culture classes.

John Waters, a young artist, has a drawing class at the Settlement. He meets Marty, a pretty little East Side girl of American stock. Marty has a sweetheart, Bob. Bob is just turned eighteen and the polished manners of the more mature Waters arouse his mild jealousy.

Marty and Bob introduce Waters to Ann Towne and her father, Martin. Towne has been out of work for some time and the family, Waters sees, is in straightened circumstances, although Ann is bravely trying to conceal the true condition of affairs. In all respects Ann is the de facto head of the household and Waters secretly admires her pluck. Ann does everything in her power to make her little sister happy, believing that Waters' attentions are meant for Marty.

On Christmas Day Waters, with characteristic generosity, gives every one in the family a Christmas present: Martin Towne a bank clerkship, Marty a scholarship in the Settlement House drawing class, Bob a better position—one which will enable him to marry Marty when she is a little older. And Ann, well, as for Ann, Walters has a little talk with the self-sacrificing "big sister," and finally not only slips a wonderful diamond ring on the third finger of her left hand, but also slips an arm around her waist, while the snow slowly falls outside and melts against the window panes.

Altogether, "The Big Sister's Christmas" is a charming, seasonable feature photodrama enacted with true Christmas fervor.

NOVEL PLANS FOR "MUTUAL GIRL."

In the coming numbers of the Mutual Girl release, made by the Reliance Motion Picture Company, a novel plan has been adopted, wherein certain prominent people tell a story to Margaret, Our Mutual Girl. In the next coming three or four releases, some of America's foremost illustrators and writers have agreed to furnish the Reliance with material for these releases, among them being William Faversham, George Barr McCutcheon and May Wilson Preston.

William Faversham tells Margaret the story of "The Hawk," which is the name of the play he is now appearing in. George Barr McCutcheon has told her of a new plot which he intends working into a story. This plot deals with the Franco-Prussian period and has a soldier of fortune in it. At present the company is engaged in taking a more than interesting picture entitled "A Day With My Work," by May Wilson Preston.

"HOUR OF DISASTER" LOOKS LIKE MASTERPIECE.

Romaine Fielding, Lubin actor, author, director, is just completing the final scenes to the feature which he expects will triumph over anything he has previously produced. This conviction has also been expressed by those Lubin officials who have witnessed many of the scenes run off. In six reels, the title of the play will be "In the Hour of Disaster," and besides possessing an absorbing, dramatic plot, there are several smashing spectacular incidents. Two of these are the wrecking of two trains when they come together in a head-on collision, and a neck and neck race at top speed between a train and a high-powered automobile. Mr. Fielding, as a physician whose wife leaves him because of jealousy over his ward, only to return when her life is saved by him, plays the leading male role. The play has a happy ending after big suspense.

"PRUNING THE MOVIES" A SCREAM.

In "Pruning the Movies" the Nestor comedy to be released on Friday, January 1, the Universal takes a sly slap at the local boards of Censorship, which have sprung up all over the country. Not content with the censorship of the National Board, these concerns, composed of local Anthony Comstocks, mutilate an innocent film beyond all recognition, the process showing the "before and after" effects being a side-splitting one. The film illustrates how titles are changed and scenes retaken, will give the motion picture theatergoer an excellent idea of the way in which self-appointed boards of out-of-work busybodies can work injury to the motion picture industry. The picture uses that most potent of all measures—ridicule—to drive home the point in which everyone in the motion picture business is interested. From start to finish the picture is chuck full of laughs and clever character drawing.

"ANY WOMAN'S CHOICE" (Essanay).

A subtle psychological problem is developed in the Essanay photoplay, "Any Woman's Choice," adapted from the Munsey story, and to be released Dec. 25, which makes it of peculiar interest. It is one of the higher plane of moral plays, in which a woman is compelled to choose between two great loves. The ending is unique. The play comes to a climax, but it is left to the spectator at the crucial point to decide the question of what the woman will do when torn between the love of a husband who had neglected her and the Other Man who had befriended and protected her.

The cast includes Beverly Bayne, Bryant Washburne, Francis X. Bushman and Helen Dunbar.

"AND PERCY GOT MARRIED" (Kriterion).

The forthcoming release of the Santa Barbara Mfg. Company through the Program of the Kriterion will mark the first release of a series of "Percy" stories which are being directed by Bert Angeles, of Vitagraph fame.

Percy, who is a soda clerk, is very much in love and has been thwarted in his attempts at marriage, by his adored one's father. Our hero hits on a scheme to get some sleeping tablets and have the daughter put them in papa's coffee so that they may elope. Instead, he finds that he has sent poison by mistake and immediately rushes to a hospital, gets two doctors and an ambulance and goes for father. They "get" him and take him to the hospital to administer an antidote much to his chagrin and disapproval. The daughter, however, had dropped the bottle and was therefore unable to administer the drug.

She explains to Percy, who is very relieved and they hasten to the village church and are "made one."

When the happy couple return home they find father a very sick man. "Forgiveness comes and everyone is happy."

Harry Fisher, son of the well-known veteran comedian of the same name, plays the original Percy.

Sidney DeGray, the former Pathe star, creates much laughter in the role of father.

Miss Ruby, who is the girl in the case and a former Universal lead, deserves notice. She is but seventeen and one of the prettiest young stars on the films.

"IN THE NAME OF THE PRINCE OF PEACE" (Dyreda).

The World Film Corporation's special release is a Dyreda Art Film "In the Name of the Prince of Peace," and the task of the producer, J. Searle Dawley, has been discharged with the utmost success. A war is in progress between France and Germany. The French have seized a convent and converted it into a fort; the German artillery attacks the convent and all the hard happenings of war occur around this abode of the prince of peace. There is, of course, a heart-story interwoven with the war episodes. The artillery scenes are magnificently staged and the producer has been very successful with his convent settings, suggesting both the atmosphere and the architecture of a French eccelsiastical center. Chiefest interest of the photoplay culminates in the convent chapel. Thither are dragged the great guns; the attacking Germans fill the sacred place with smoke and shell; soldiers struggle and die. But the priest says mass just the same. The prayer for peace goes up whilst war goes on just outside the altar rails.

PIKE'S PEAK FILM COMPANY.

A new motion picture company has been formed at Colorado Springs, Col. Otis B. Thayer is the producing director and George Gebhart will have the leading roles. The leading woman will be Josephine West. All are well-known picture players with long records of service in screen productions. Releases will be made through the United Film Service (Warners Features).

Detailed information regarding these will be made public at a later date.

THE NEXT FAVORITE PLAYERS RELEASE.

The coming Favorite Players picture entitled "The Last Chapter," to be released on the Alliance Program, about the first of the year, is taken from Richard Harding Davis' story called "The Unfinished Story."

"The Unfinished Story," while containing excellent material for the display of the motion picture art, is one of those mystery stories, which leave the reader in doubt as to the actual meaning of the author. This form of handling, while permissible in literature, is unsuitable for cinematographic productions. In picturing "The Unfinished Story" it was found necessary to write the last chapter, and the story was therefore called "The Last Chapter."

In making these changes the Favorite Players conferred with Richard Harding Davis, and the screen version as produced is the result of the conference of the two parties interested.

The story is the love story of an African explorer, whose sufferings in Central Africa are vividly portrayed on the screen, and whose final success and return to civilization and the girl he loves, form the main theme and climax of a series of stirring incidents in a well-developed plot.

Charles L. Gaskill's play, "Underneath the Paint," which will be given its first public showing at the Vitagraph theater on Monday, December 14, has been declared by A. E. Smith, of the Vitagraph Company, to be "almost a perfect picture." This statement coming from a man as critical in judgment and as exacting in his demand of artistic work as Mr. Smith is known to be, speaks volumes in praise of this production.

It is said, that in the leading role, Miss Helen Gardner convincingly demonstrates that real art is practically unlimited in the motion picture drama and that her characterization of the ambitious young actress, in which she portrays the conflicting emotions, born of the fires of ambition and the breath of love, is the acme of dramatic expression and a visualization of crystal clearness.

In addition to its superficial merit as a drama of more than usual interest, "Underneath the Paint" has an undercurrent of deep thought. Without moralizing, it points to the all too prevalent practice of deception and the error and danger and self-defeating effect of this despicable trait.

"A PERILOUS PASSAGE" (Lubin).

In this installment of "The Beloved Adventurer," Lady Betty plays a very conspicuous part and shows her western life training by the expert use of the lariat on horseback. A nephew of the good Lord Cecil returns from India, being intrusted with a priceless diamond to be delivered to the King of England, to express the future loyalty of a conquering Prince. The jewel is stolen by the gang of conspirators of which the Countess Lurovich is the chief. Betty lassoes the thief and the peasants of Croftlaigh drive the conspirators to the edge of a cliff which collapses, carrying them to death. This is the fourteenth chapter of the series, after which there is one more to come, in which the Beloved Adventurer and his Lady Fair, having passed many vicissitudes, are now permitted to grasp the rest and perfect happiness to which they are richly entitled.

A NEW PICTURE SCREEN.

Edwin Bower Hesser, of 1600 Broadway, has added another department to his business in acquiring the exclusive distributing rights to the Goldenlite Fibre Screen, which is made in St. Louis. Mr. Hesser has formed the Goldenlite Distributing Company, of which he is general manager, for the marketing rights in this country and abroad. The factory in St. Louis is equipped to turn out forty screens each week, and is one of the largest screen making plants in the country.

Goldenlite is a fibre which is so treated metalically that it is gold all through. Every thread is metallic, and non-tarnishable, so that its color is always kept. It is the first washable and waterproof gold fibre screen to be put on the market. At a demonstration given before a group of trade paper men the early part of the week, it was demonstrated that the screen requires only half the electric current necessary to throw a picture of brilliancy equal to the white screen, when Goldenlite is used. It was also shown that soap and water could be used in the cleaning, and that the surface is absolutely waterproof and non-porous.

Particularly interesting was the fact that when viewed from an angle the picture was not distorted, and that close to the picture was just as soft as from a distance. The claim is made that "the front row of a picture house is as good as the back" when this screen is used.

"THE WAR PIGEON"—A ROMANCE OF 1812.

A new Canadian company, organized last July, lately released a three-reel drama founded on the historic battle at De Cours house on the Niagara Peninsula in 1812. The scenario was written and produced by Frederic Colburn Clarke from a story by Arthur Stringer, a well-known Canadian writer. It is full of stirring action, and the scenery and costumes of the period contribute to make an artistic as well as historic production. Mr. Clarke also organized a force of photographers throughout Canada at the opening of the present war in England, and now the All Red Weekly furnishes a weekly reel of pictures to Canadian theaters from coast to coast, the recent government edict barring such weeklies from Canada not having affected the All Red owing to the fact that the latter promoted enlistment and the former by showing results of war in England proved a deterrent.

The British American Company of Detroit will handle both the "War Pigeon" and the Weekly in the United States.

CENTAUR-BAYONNE STUDIO OPEN TO OUTSIDE PRODUCERS.

Owing to the fact that David Horsley has sent all of his producing forces to Los Angeles for the winter, the Centaur studio at Bayonne, N. J., has been offered for rent.

The Centaur studio has just been equipped with Cooper-Hewitt and Kleigel lights, is glass topped and, in point of equipment and arrangement, is second to none in America.

NONPAREIL FEATURE.

The Nonpareil Feature Film Corporation is completing a new six-reel feature of "Alice in Wonderland." No expense is being spared to make this one of the most wonderful scenic and interesting productions of the day. Every child in the country is familiar with the story of "Alice in Wonderland," and there is still a fond memory in the minds of grown-ups. The Nonpareil is endeavoring to release this picture during Christmas week.

The "Line-up at Police Headquarters" is booked solid in all of the fourteen exchanges of the company, and the same can be said for their two-reel comedy of "Happy Hooligan." William Counihan, president of the Nonpareil Feature Film Corporation, feels confident that "Alice in Wonderland" will follow up the company's other successes.

SMALLWOOD FEATURES MISS GRANDIN.

The Smallwood Film Corporation is busily at work producing one and two-reel Grandin Brand films featuring Miss Ethel Grandin, for the United Film Service (Warner's Features). Beginning with December 21, when the "Adopted Daughter," an underworld story in three parts, featuring Miss Grandin, will be released, the company will regularly release two singles or one multiple reel each week. The Grandin release for December 28 will be a comedy drama entitled "Cupid Kicks a Goal." The following week "His Doll Wife," another comedy drama, will be released.

Within a few weeks time the Smallwood Film Corporation will put on a second company which will produce farce comedies. Ray C. Smallwood, the secretary and vice-president of the company, has charge of the production department.

BIG EXPLOSION IN "ZUDORA."

An entire hill more than one-quarter of a mile in circumference is blown up by dynamite in episode five of "Zudora," Thanhouser's big serial. This hill is the home of two aged inventors who have given to the world an instrument which makes "A Perpetual Glare." This contrivance, too, can set any object on fire at a distance of several miles. Hassam Ali, played by James Cruze, uses this invention to further harass his niece, Zudora, given admirable portrayal by Marguerite Snow.

DYREDA TO PICTURE HARRIS SONGS.

The Dyreda Art Film Corporation has arranged to produce two of Charles K. Harris' song successes in pictures. The numbers secured are "Always in the Way" and "Break the News to Mother." The work of casting has already begun at the Dyreda Art Film studios. Special productions are to be made for both of these films and it is planned that they will become sterling features in the World Film Corporation service.

Jackie Saunders

ON HER first visit to the East in three years, Jackie Saunders, leading woman with Balboa, dropped in on her mother in Philadelphia on Thanksgiving morning. A few days later she came over to New York, and here she remained for several days. Miss Saunders, who has been playing in Balboa pictures for nearly a year, has just signed a contract with the same company for three years.

Jackie Saunders

Miss Saunders has been on the screen nearly three years. Prior to her present engagement she was with the Biograph and then with the Universal, where for a while she played opposite Edwin August. Miss Saunders was for three years ingenue in the Orpheum Stock company of Philadelphia. One of the Balboa subjects in which Miss Saunders appeared is "The Will o' the Wisp," in four parts, and another is "Little Jack."

"I like to play ragged boy parts," said Miss Saunders. "These arouse more sympathy. Of course, I don't ignore the society stuff, but you know I may have a lot of time in which to take that up when I am older. Really, I prefer the waifs. I expect to make picture playing my life-work. Speaking about work, our studio, you know, is at Long Beach, in California, and all there is to do out there is to work, eat and sleep."

THE DOLLAR CHRISTMAS FUND.

The Dollar Christmas Fund, which is backed by a representative American committee, is now co-operating actively with the London Shilling Fund to avert starvation among the Belgians this winter. The Shilling Fund has collected over $400,000 and has arranged to receive donations from New York by cable so that American subscribers desirous that their donations shall allay distress at Christmas will be gratified. To achieve success generous help is still needed and for this purpose Henry Clews, treasurer of the Dollar Christmas Fund, makes a renewed appeal. The time to Christmas is short, but it is long enough to enable all to lend a helping hand. It is proposed to cable money from New York as late as Dec. 23 so that American help will be available almost to Christmas Day. A cablegram received in New York this week from the London Fund which is well organized to distribute relief amongst the most necessitous cases says: "We are all very grateful to America for generous assistance but the necessities of the Belgians are so great that more donations are urgently required. Do your level best before Christmas." All donations should be sent to Mr. Henry Clews, Broad St., New York.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

CONDITIONS are beginning to improve in the National Capital so far as the moving picture interests are concerned, but the legitimate houses are still complaining and stating that the moving picture put a crimp into their game. A number of very satisfactory reports are coming in and the outlook for a good season is excellent. These reports are exceedingly interesting, especially in view of the fact that several are made by exhibitors who show but three reels for five cents but who have competitors who are showing even up to eight reels for the same money and are almost giving their profits away in purchasing souvenirs to attract patronage.

"It is extremely pitiful," said an exhibitor to the Moving Picture World correspondent, "how hard some of us will go to gain a foothold. I have a competitor who but recently entered the field who seems to have lost his head completely. When he first entered my neighborhood I was afraid that he was going to get considerable of my business for he was showing a much earlier run of pictures than I, but he did not get the people coming to his house fast enough and he thought it was because he did not give them enough for their money. He offered various inducements but the people had become accustomed to going to the older houses and his bait failed, although without a doubt if he had taken it a little easier he would have obtained his share of patronage. He got nervous and now he is running eight reels for a nickel, and we no longer fear him. In order to do this he had to obtain a much cheaper service and it will not be long at that rate before he ties himself up into a knot with his own rope. Giving the people junk, no matter how much of it you may show at the one price, is a thing of the past and even raffles and other games of chance soon lose their effectiveness. Building up a business by these methods produces an unsound condition, for once begun they must be continued and little or no profit results. As long as the man works along these lines I have no fear of him as a competitor.

The exhibitors in this city who have been in the game for any length of time realize that it is quality rather than quantity that holds the trade, and that in order to give quality one must get satisfactory returns, and thus they look upon such fellows as the one in question as a huge joke, and a joke he is.

Charles Lovejoy, formerly with the Lubin Company, in Philadelphia, has been given a position as road man with the local office of Warner's Features, Inc.

It is expected that the investigations of the Quartermaster Corps in the matter of moving picture projecting machines and phonographs, to be distributed at sixty-six army posts will continue during the present month, although rumor had it that the awards had already been made Upon inquiry at the War Department, this was denied and it was stated that it might be several weeks yet before a decision was made. Last Friday, a three reel Western, "Brand of Bars," by the Nelson Film Corporation, and "Stung by the Bee," a Premier comedy single, were exhibited on the machines that are being demonstrated on the fifth floor of the State, War and Navy Building, to a group of army officers. These films were furnished by Warner's Features, Inc., at the request of Mr. Britton, who is assisting in the making of the tests of the various machines.

George R. Osborne, formerly with the General Film Company, has accepted a position as road man with the Eclectic Feature Film Company. He is no relation at all to Manager Osborne, although bearing the same name.

J. B. Hutchins, who operates the Olympic Theatre, at Portsmouth, Va., was a visitor here last week.

When W. F. Thompson, of the Dreamland Theatre, Portsmouth, Va., asknowledged a letter from Lieutenant Jim P. Anderson, manager of the local office of the Greater New York Film Rental Company, and the Box Office Attractions Company, who had wished him luck and had inquired as to the condition of business in Portsmouth, he said: "I thank you for your good wishes and can only say that Harry Church, Bonita, Norfolk, said about enough to cover the situation, on page 1403 Moving Picture World of December 5 edition." It shows how widely the Moving Picture World is read. In the article referred to Mr. Church was quoted as saying that business in Norfolk was so flat that it would almost take an earthquake to shake things up a bit. Not very encouraging to say the least.

J Gomprecht, traveling representative of the Greater New York Film Rental Company, paid a visit to the local office of that concern last week.

M. J. Fray, of the Fairfax Theatre, Culpepper, Va., was seen here last week running for good features.

The Greater New York Film Rental Company have removed to 305 Ninth Street, Northwest, where they occupy the upper two floors of the building. About all they have done is move, however, and it will be some little time before things are straightened out to Manager Anderson's liking. Lieutenant Jim says its some hard job, this moving business, but now that the stuff is on the premises and the carpenters are working nights perhaps he will eventually get straightened out. When the carpenters are finally shooed out of the building the Greater New York will have everything about as they want it in the way of office accommodations. At the front of the first floor considerable space has been railed off for the manager's office. The central space will be fitted out for the use of exhibitors and here will be shown the large six sheets showing the productions of the Box Office Attractions Company. The remaining space will be used for a shipping department. Mr. Anderson plans to subdivide the second floor so as to give opportunity for a projection room at the rear where will be shwn the big features, while the space at the front will be used for assembly purposes, meetings of exhibitors, etc. He is well pleased with the new location.

The Hippodrome Amusement Company, which operates the Hippodrome moving picture theatre at 808 K Street, Northwest, has brought suit in the District Supreme Court for an injunction to restrain Mary M. E. Stenz from taking action to dispossess it from the premises. The bill of complaint states that on December 1, 1909, the company leased the premises from the defendant for a period of five years at a rental of $1,500 per year, the lease containing a provision which gives to the complainant company the right of renewal of the lease for two more years at a reasonable advance in the rent. The company states that it desires to renew the lease under this provision, but that the defendant demands an advance that is exorbitant and not in accordance with the agreement. The defendant, it alleges, demands a monthly rental of $200. The company expresses a willingness to pay an advance of 10 per cent., or even 20 per cent., over the old rental, but not the 60 per cent. asked by the defendant, and asks that the court restrain her from any action looking to their dispossession and to fix and determine a reasonable advance in rental. They state they have expended more than $2,000 on the theatre and have built up a paying business.

The Empire Circuit Company of Ohio, has brought suit against Andrew J. Thomas and Sherman H. Dudley, to whom it subleased the Lyceum Theatre at a rental of $6,500 per year, to recover $1,083.34, with interest which it claims is due it for rent for the months of October and November. The lease runs from August 22, 1914, to September 22, 1915.

Three cameramen were on the job Saturday, December 5, when a reception was held at Ogram's drug store, Thirteenth Street and Pennsylvania Avenue, Northwest, by a group of young women dressed in Belgian style and by Children of the American Revolution dressed in replica of the famous costumes on exhibition in the National Museum. The occasion was the carnival to secure a "mile of pennies" for the relief of the children of Belgium, and the pictures taken of the little ones of this city bringing in their pennies to help swell the fund will be used to secure similar results in other places.

The collier Caesar of the United States Navy will leave the navy yard dock on or about December 15, for San Francisco, by way of the Panama Canal, carrying in its hold more than forty carloads of material in the shape of charts, models, moving picture outfits, etc., which will go to make up Uncle Sam's exhibit at the Panama-Pacific Exposition. In the motion picture exhibits there will be almost a dozen reels illustrating the seal fisheries of Alaska and of other things pertaining to the arctic country; the Reclamation Service will have a number of reels portraying the drainage and irrigation projects; there will be innumerable reels of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, better known as Uncle Sam's money factory; pictures of the United States mint; and of the many other branches of the government.

C. L. LINZ.

INDIANA.

PART of the evidence made public by the grand jury report in the wholesale indictment of Indiana officials on charges of making illegal drafts upon the state funds, is devoted to a denunciation of the practice of lobbying, the "Moving Picture Show Association" being implicated.

There is no organization by this name. The grand jury report, however, is to the effect that Dan Brown and Taylor Groninger, attorneys, were paid $50 a week, each, to represent the Association's interests. These men were in touch with officers of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League.

The motion picture exhibitors in touch with what was offered in the way of legislation at the last session of the legislature hardly share the indignation expressed in the grand jury report at the practice of lobbying. Most of the legislation was of a character that would have licensed the business to an unreasonable extent, censored the productions into innocuous desuetude, and left the managers helpless in the direction of their business.

There is no charge made that the men representing the picture interests did anything more than to watch closely the nature of every bill introduced, and when it was a bill inimical to the interests of the exhibitor, the facts and best argument available were taken before the committee having it under consideration. There is no reason for believing the Indiana exhibitors would have fared well if steps had not been taken to leave nothing to chance.

As one exhibitor said, "lobbying may be pernicious, but there seems no other way to prevent unjust or foolish legislation being put upon the statute books. As I see it, no legislator is omniscient enough to understand every business well enough to know without being told just what harm may exist in any proposed legislation. Each year from 700 to 900 bills are introduced. Theoretically, every legislator should know every bill, an obvious impossibility. Practically, the legislator does well if he personally investigates fifty bills, and for his action on the rest he is glad to have all the outside help he can get. There will always be two sides to the so-called lobbying question."

The Indianapolis police are picketing the motion picture houses that do not pay their "charity" assessments to the Joseph E. Bell Moving Picture Charity Fund. To the exhibitors who feel that every one keeping open Sunday should bear his share of the burden, the sight of a policeman outside a house, is a signal for glee. So far every house picketed has "come across" for the fund. Until the police took charge, the contributions were voluntary, and the percentage who paid was low. The city officials are determined that everyone keeping open shall pay the share. The police doing picket duty are instructed to get the name of every house patron, presumably as witnesses to the fact that the place was open on Sunday. The presence has always had the desired effect upon the theater owner.

G. C. Zaring bought the Northwestern theater of Starbuck & Starbuck, and will continue the management of the Indianapolis house along the lines inaugurated by the former owners. Mr. Zaring is a brother of A. C. Zaring, secretary of the Indians Motion Picture Exhibitors' League.

Moving picture houses all over the state are raising the price of admission to ten cents, the war tax of $25 for a seating capacity of 250 being the reason given the public on all sides. At Evansville the houses will all be charging the higher rate soon, it is declared, particularly the centrally located houses. The same thing is true at Princeton. The revenue tax is mentioned in Princeton as a cause for the advance, along with the higher cost of film service, the advance in carbons, not to mention state and local taxes. The managers seem suddenly to have awakened to the fact that though attendance is good, other things that enter into the profit of doing business have increased the overhead. The advance in admission is looked upon as the only way out.

George H. Terrill, proprietor of the New Grand, Corydon, Ind., has installed a dynamo and gasoline engine and is generating his own "juice."

The Luna theater, Tipton, has been closed. The promoters, it is declared, lacked capital to continue, after having spent money freely on a fancy front.

The Indiana Union movies at Indiana University, opened with students packed three deep, all around the walls, and all standing room at a premium. A drama, two comedies, and an industrial feature picture made up the first program.

H. H. Johnson, owner of the Luna theater, Lafayette, has bought a $4,500 pipe organ of the Jamison Piano Company. The instrument gives the effect of a twenty-piece orchestra, and will imitate anything from a telephone bell to a steamboat whistle. The contract calls for installation in three weeks.

The case was part of the plan to close the Jeffersonville houses on Sunday, and the action of Justice Ogden means the Sunday forces will have to start over again.

LYNCHBURG, VA.

CORBIN SHIELD, a well known theatrical manager, who, several years ago, was in charge of the Academy of Music, and assumed the management of the Trenton theater in June, has severed his connection with that house and is still in Lynchburg. Shield has been with quite a few houses controlled by the Wells Amusement Company and managed the Bijou in Savannah, Ga., several years ago.

The new National theater opened its doors ten days ago, and is one of the most attractive motion picture houses in this section of the State. "The Drug Terror" created interest and the next feature, "Damon and Pythias," is booked for three days, commencing December 7.

ILLINOIS.

JOLIET has barred the problem play films, especially those dealing with the white slave traffic. Chief of Police Martin Murphy's letter to the exhibitors ordering the discontinuance of this class of pictures is said to have been issued without any agitation or demands. The police head implied that the city was being surfeited with this class of stuff. Announcements that children under 16 would not be allowed at these shows created the idea that something of a risque character was being shown. "Pictures fit for our small children to see" is the aim of Chief Murphy. The chief also criticised some of the posters which have been seen in front of Joliet houses. Particular objection was made to a short-skirted womoman pouring chappagne into the hats of men underneath. Such posters, he said, will not be tolerated. Another police official gave his opinion that Joliet had been made the dumping ground for a lot of films that had been passed by the Chicago board. While the pictures were not immoral they were just suggestive enough to pique the curiosity of the young and, with strong competition in the sex stuff, the opportunity for showing some beneficial pictures was being overlooked by the managers.

It was contended that it was necessary for the operator traveling with the show to have charge of the projection so that the scenes would be simultaneous with the phonographic lecture accompanying it. The regular operator, L. Dickey, is said to have interrupted the show by ejecting the non-union operator and turning on the house lights. Manager J. T. Gray, of the Washington, and Dickey are then reported to have "mixed," but the resultant situation was explained to the crowd with the announcement that the show was over. The trouble is being subtly referred to as a demand that the union operators be allowed to run all Creation.

THE South End Amusement Company of Louisville has taken out a building permit for the erection of the new Shelby theater, which will be put up at 1200 South Shelby street. The new building will be of brick and will be 47x140 feet. The estimated cost is $11,000.

The Masonic theater, of Louisville, which has been dark for several weeks, was reopened by special arrangement with the International Motion Picture Company, for the purpose of showing the war scenes in the four-reel production prepared for in Belgium by Edwin F. Weigle, staff photographer of the Chicago Tribune. A portion of the box office receipts from these pictures was set aside for relief work in Belgium. The pictures made such a hit with the people of Louisville that special arrangements were made to extend the term of the engagement two days. War pictures and war plays are drawing exceptionally well in the city just now.

While a number of local motion picture houses from time to time display a slide requesting ladies to remove their hats, the Walnut theater, Louisville, is about the only one which has tried to enforce removal of hats. If a young lady fails to take off her hat in the Walnut theater after a sufficient interval of time, one of the ushers quietly asks that the hat be removed. It always brings the desired effect and it is very seldom that any one takes offense. It has been noted in all the moving picture houses that women are beginning to act reasonably about the hat question and the percentage of bobbing hats is diminishing considerably, especially at night, as the escorts have taken a hand in the matter.

The Wurlitzer motion picture orchestra which was recently installed in the new Alamo theater, on Fourth avenue, Louisville, is the eighth Wurlitzer instrument which M. Switow has purchased and placed in moving picture houses inside of the past few years.

The Ministers' Association of Evansville, Ind., has decided to ask the Mayor to compel chorus girls in Sunday shows to wear more dress and less stocking. The ministers claim that Sunday shows have been too immodest. Nothing was said concerning moving picture shows.

Mr. Pollard will start a new moving picture house in Jackson and has announced that it will be the best equipped house in the Kentucky mountain district.

The Arcade theater, of Paducah, Ky., controlled by Col. Dan Russell, of Louisville, closed on Nov. 22. It was announced by Benjamin C. Neat, of Louisville, who is manager of the house, that owing to poor business the playhouse would be unable to continue. A meeting of creditors will be called and steps taken to arrange for disposing of the property and the lease.

A deal for consolidating the Harrodsburg Amusement Company and the Colonial Moving Picture Company, of Harrodsburg, Ky., which has been hanging fire for some time past, has finally been consummated. Messrs. Vivion, Marksbury, Grimes and Fisher retire from the concerns. The Colonial will be operated only on Saturday nights for the time being. The opera house has several good serials going, among which are "The Million Dollar Mystery," "Trey o' Hearts" and the "Perils of Pauline."

"When the Tango Craze Hit Lexington," is the title of a two-reel comedy which was recently made in the Bluegrass City, under the direction of H. S. Karns. A company of about forty of Lexington's young society people composed the cast, and the film includes a Kentucky State University cadet drill, a number of street scenes, and scenes from two or three big university football games held in Lexington this fall. The reception scene was laid in the home of Louis des Cognets. The tango craze was started in the play by a powder which, when inhaled, set every one dancing. The picture was originally produced for the purpose of supplying funds for the Baby Milk Supply Station, and was shown two days at the Ben Ali theater at Lexington, the entire proceeds being turned over to the milk fund. The pictures were later shown at Nicholasville under the same arrangement and several theaters in other cities have asked for them. A number of young society people of Louisville also took part in the pictures.

Fresh trouble has developed between the moving picture men of Frankfort, Ky., and the authorities on the question of operating Sunday moving picture shows. L. E. Marshall, a councilman of Frankfort, has been making it hot for the operators and has sought a warrant issued for the arrest of E. K. Lyon, manager of a moving picture show, on the ground that he was violating a Sunday-closing ordinance. Police Judge W. C. Herndon refused to issue a warrant and mandamus proceedings to force him to were instigated. The case was carried into the Court of Appeals. The test suit was brought by City Prosecutor Moss. Lyon came into the case and alleged that the ordinance had been repealed, but offered no proof. After hearing the case Judge Nunn, of the Court of Appeals, handed down a decision in which he said: "Unless the ordinance of the city of Frankfort prohibiting business on Sunday has been suspended, the Franklin Circuit Court must grant a writ of mandamus requiring W. C. Herndon, police judge, to issue a warrant at the instance of L. B. Marshall, for the arrest of moving picture managers operating their shows on Sunday." The judgment of the Franklin Circuit Court refusing the writ having been reversed, it now looks as if the moving picture houses will be forced to close on Sunday unless a record of the repeal of the ordinance can be found.

G. D. CRAIN, JR.

TENNESSEE.

A BETTER feeling is being noted throughout Tennessee by motion picture men and business men in nearly every line of trade. Cotton has at last started moving and conditions are considerably improved. The day laborer is not finding it anything like as hard to get work as was the case a few weeks ago and the moving picture houses are doing a correspondingly good business. The high priced theaters, on the other hand, have not been drawing well and shows which were to have been seen in Tennessee were in some cases routed directly West without invading the Southern territory.

Moving picture men of Nashville recently won a victory which apparently invalidated the Sunday closing law, when two cases against two theater managers were dismissed. These cases had been pending for some time and were continued twice before the final decision was given. The cases were against W. H. Wassman and William Hartman, who were charged with operating their theaters several hours on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 15. The men were arrested on the same day on which their houses were found in operation, and preparations for the defense caused the two delays in trying them. Attorney Alfred Levine, who represented the defendants, bitterly attacked the constitutionality of the ordinance which prohibits the operation of amusement places in Nashville. He claimed that according to the decision rendered by the higher courts the men had a perfect right to operate Sunday shows. The disposition of these cases will probably result in a general attempt to open all of the moving picture houses in Nashville, but in the future only pictures carrying religious truths and which in no way can be objectionable will be shown. Mr. Wassman is proprietor of the Rex and Crystal theaters, on Fifth avenue, and Mr. Hartman owns a motion picture house on Cedar street.

The Crescent Amusement Company, of Nashville, on Nov. 25 showed a number of pictures of the Modern Woodmen of America at the Princess theater. Good crowds were drawn, not only from the many members of the fraternal beneficiary society but also from the general public. A vaudeville entertainment was billed along with the pictures, which included "The Man Who Came Back," views of the Woodman sanatorium at Woodman, Col., near Colorado Springs, and also views of the National camp which was held at Toledo, O., last June.

The Jeffersonian Debating Club, of Nashville, at a recent meeting at its club rooms on Vine street, definitely decided in a debate that more education is acquired through the right sort of motion pictures than is gained through travel. The affirmative was represented by J. Berr Thaxton and Mr. Goodpasture, and the negative by E. L. Cristeson and J. Alvin Bohanon.

The Majestic theater, of Chattanooga, Tenn., recently projected Burton Holmes' European pictures, which are known as "War-Time Europe." While these pictures do not show any actual fighting; they show a large number of scenes in parts of Russia, Germany, Austria, England and France. A number of army manouvers and photographs of the Czar and Kaiser reviewing troops and military activities of many kinds were part of the special reels and the patrons of the theater took a great deal of interest in them.

The owners of the Majestic Amusement Company, of Memphis, have two houses in the city which go under the name of the Majestic, but one house is Majestic No. 1 and the other is Majestic No. 2. No. 1 is located at 49 South Main street and No. 2 opposite the Hotel Gayoso. The company also operates the Empire theaters, which are five cent theaters, and the same distinction is made in the name, as there is both a No. 1 and No. 2. The programs at the four houses are all different.

O. C. Jackson, manager of the Dixie theater, of Paris, for five nights, recently, had the Lewis Stock Company, band and orchestra and moving pictures on at one time. The feature film, "The Perils of Pauline," was shown between the acts, and the prices were fifteen cents upstairs and twenty-five cents downstairs.

The Pluto theater, of Chattanooga, recently ran the first installment of the serial, "A Gentleman Adventurer," in which Warren Kerrigan takes the principal part. This serial will run for fourteen weeks in all. The author, Louis Vance, made a great hit with his serial, "Trey o' Hearts," and the new serial is expected to go still better.

DETROIT.

AN important change is announced by John H. Kunsky of the Casino Amusement Company, operating a chain of theaters in Detroit. Howard Pierce, manager of the Washinghton, on Washington boulevard, since the house opened in August, has been transferred to the main office in the Dime Bank building, where he will have charge of general publicity for all of the Kunsky theaters. In addition, he will edit and have full charge of the "Weekly Film News," which is to be the house organ for Mr. Kunsky's various enterprises. It will have, for the present, 16 pages, 8 by 9 inches in size, will be illustrated, with cover in two colors, and contains film news of general interest to moving picture patrons. The first issue will be out sometime in December. The weekly distribution will be approximately 50,000 copies, most of which will be mailed to the regular patrons of each theater. In the selection of Mr. Pierce to handle the publicity as well as the house organ, Mr. Kunsky made an excellent move. Mr. Pierce, who is considerably under 30 years of age, has spent practically a life time in the theatrical business, having "pushed scenery," handled the pasteboards, counted the cash, acted as publicity agent, and managed theaters. He first came to Mr. Kunsky eighteen months ago and was placed in charge of the Liberty. With the excellent training which every man gets under the tutorship of Mr. Kunsky it was only a comparatively short while before Mr. Pierce was managing this house like one who had been at it for years. The Liberty was a huge success from the very start, and while the house itself and the class of attractions were undoubtedly largely responsible for it, the fact cannot be denied that the success of any theater depends a great deal upon the manager. When the Washington was taken over by Mr. Kunsky from a dramatic stock theater and changed to a picture house, Mr. Pierce was transferred there, where he has remained until the final change above mentioned.

H. W. Irons, until recently manager of the Liberty and previously manager of the Royal theater (both Kunsky houses), has succeeded

W. C. Skerett, of the British-American Feature Film Company, 1613 Dime Bank building, will soon open a new theater in Wayne, Mich., about 25 miles from Detroit. Work has already been started on the commercial pictures and the comedies will start after the New Year. The company's quarters are on the top floor of the Liggett building, and consist of an office and printing and developing room. A complete equipment for doing the work has been installed. The company will have a special studio for making its comedies. The officers are Charles G. Rose, president; Frank J. Schaffer, vice-president; Percy R. Upton, secretary and treasurer. The capital stock is $20,000. Messrs. Rose and Schaffer have been in the moving picture business for eight years, and for the past eighteen months have been co-partners in a company known as the "S & R," doing commercial work only. Previous to entering the motion picture industry, both men were in the photographic business.

Beals, secretary; Arthur Connor, attorney, on the board of directors; Edward J. Corbert, vice-president, and H. Armstrong, treasurer. Louis Myll is the acting manager and director of the company. It is the intention of the company to produce a new comedy every week and a three-reel drama every three weeks.

Mr. Jeup will retain his interest in the Luna theater at St. Aubin and Fort streets. He went to New York on December 6 to attend the meeting of the executive committee of the National Association.

Educational moving pictures are soon to be provided for grammar grade school children on Saturday morning at the Washington theater, according to an announcement made by Superintendent of Schools Chadsey at the regular meeting of school principals held November 30. The plan is to send free tickets each week to designated schools for distribution by the teachers. The object is to give pupils the educational benefit that is to be derived from moving pictures and the films will be carefully selected with this aim in view.

Detroit streets with their dense traffic and crowds will be settings for an interesting series of safety-first moving picture accidents to be staged by the Safety First Society for exhibition circuits traveled by the Ford Weekly films, as part of an accident-prevention educational campaign. Inspector William P. Rutledge of the police department will be "stage manager." He will halt traffic when desired and will look after setting the stage for the "accidents" and runs of police patrols and ambulances to the scene. Street cars and railroad trains will be called into the work. The films will later be shown in most of the picture houses of Detroit and other cities.

James H. Moore of the Temple theater is recovering from an operation for appendicitis at Grace hospital.

Several thousand dollars have been spent by the Miles theater in improving the front by installing additional electric signs, which keep flashing.

Statistics show that during the first ten months of this year building permits to the extent of $260,850 were issued for theater construction. With furnishings, equipment and property this means that practically a million dollars has been invested in the amusement industry, most of which being for moving pictures.

"The Temple of Molock," a Red Cross moving picture dealing with the problem of tuberculosis in children, was recently shown at the New Empire and has been booked in a dozen smaller theaters. It is a part of a campaign being conducted by the Red Cross for the sale of Christmas seals.

NEW ENGLAND.

THE management of the Boston Opera House discontinued the exhibition of moving pictures last Saturday. The announcement of this decision caused considerable surprize, as it was thought that the venture was successful, but according to Manager W. R. Macdonald, photoplays have been abandoned because of the lack of patronage. Film shows were first produced at this playhouse in the middle of October. The management at that time stated that it wished to keep the house force intact pending the disappearance of clouds on the operatic horizon. For the first few weeks, imported films were the attractions, but two weeks ago it was decided to use Paramount service. It is now planned to keep the house closed until the opening of the next operatic season.

Manki hi Fukagawa, who claims to be a moving picture actor, and Mrs. Anna E. Hayes, both of New York, were married last week at the office of the city clerk in Somerville, Mass. The ceremony was performed by Assistant City Clerk Howard E. Wemyss, after Judge Wentworth of the district court had granted the couple permission to set aside the five day law.

Moving pictures, showing a complete trip through the factory and testing rooms of the Maxwell Motor Company, were witnessed at the Franklin Union, Boston, last week. They were shown under the auspices of the local branch of the company and were free to the public. The pictures showed Maxwell cars skirting around a very high precipice and skidding about a hairpin turn during the progress of an automobile race.

A private exhibition of the moving picture of the European War was given at the Boston Athletic Association clubhouse on Exeter Street, Back Bay, last Sunday. The show was given by Manager Thomas T. Hoyne of the Popular Motion Picture Company at the request of a group of prominent Boston business men. Five hundred members of the association and their friends were at the performance, which [illegible] appreciated. These are the [illegible] tures to be [illegible] attra[illegible] shown in Boston during his administration, that children cannot attend a theatre without a violation of the law and that the only violation of this sort had resulted in the revocation of the theatre's license, when it was brought to his honor's attention. The protest was conducted by the Hon. James P. Magenis, recent Progressive candidate for lieutenant-governor. The mayor asserted that the license would not be granted because plans had been completed for the erection of a maternity hospital on the site adjoining the proposed theatre. The residents of Roslindale also voiced their opinions before the mayor as to the merits of a picture house at the corner of Poplar and Washington streets in that section. The petition of Charles H. Weiss to reopen the former Rex Theatre, which has been closed during the past year, was the subject of debate. The mayor has taken the application under advisement, as those favoring and objecting to the license were evenly divided.

L. M. Mosher, manager of the new Franklin Park theatre, announces as the opening attraction of the new playhouse, the Paramount production, "Behind the Scenes," featuring Mary Pickford.

Howard Smiley of Mathison, Maine, was the guest of E. J. Farrell of the General Film Company at the Exhibitor's ball.

Owing to the success of the film production of Rex Beach's novel "The Spoilers" at the Boston Theatre and the fact that previous bookings make it impossible for it to continue at this playhouse, arrangements have been made to transfer it to the National Theatre on Tremont street, where two performances daily will be given.

The Women's Educational and Industrial Union has announced a series of Saturday morning moving picture shows of interest to women. These will be produced in Tremont Temple, Boston. The shows are an effort on the part of the Union to amplify the work of its children's players depaartment so as to provide dramatic attractions, monthly, instead of yearly for the children. Monthly prizes of five dollar gold pieces will be awarded to the child, under fifteen years of age, who writes the [illegible] letter on one of the pictures shown at the [illegible]ous month's performance.

W. R. Skates, former manager of the Boston office of the General Film Company, and now connected with the World Film Corporation, stopped at the Hotel Touraine, Boston, for a few days, last week.

Although Chicago intends to do away with women ushers in the picture houses, Boston will keep them. When fire authorities in the Hub learned of the intentions of the Windy City officials, they began to get busy. It was learned that the women ushers in the various Boston houses had not been put through a fire drill, although they knew how to open the exits, but there was no guarantee against fainting or screaming. For a few days, it has looked bad for the girls, but the theatrical managers came to their rescue when they told Fire Prevention Commissioner O'Keefe that the abolition of women ushers would tend to ruin the business. Mr. O'Keefe agreed with them. The managers then said that every woman usher should have a male escort to render aid and comfort in the time of distress. It will be the duty of the male attendant to see that the fire exits are open if they ought to be open, otherwise to keep quiet, until the ladies need their assistance. This ought to help the Chicago officials.

Manager and Mrs George Appleby of the Empire Theatre, Portland, Maine, were in Boston, during the week, booking many new features. They attended the ball, where Mrs. Appleby was one of the contestants in the prize dances for the silver cups.

George A. Hickey, manager of the Warner Features, Inc., office at Portland, Maine, and Charles Stern, manager of the Bangor office of the Universal Film Company, managed to get away from their duties for a day yast week to visit their friends in Boston and attend the Exhibitors' ball.

John H. Cogswell, mayoralty candidate in Lynn, Mass., is adding much interest to his campaign by entertaining the Lynn children to moving picture shows. After each performance Mr. Cogswell delivers a political speech in which he urges children to persuade their parents to cast their votes for him.

Clara Kimball Young of the World Film Corporation is now the proud possessor of a medal, which was presented to her by Adjutant General Charles S. Cole of Governor's Walsh's staff, when she visited him at his office in the State House at Boston on the day after the Exhibitors' ball. Miss Young was the general's partner in the grand march.

"Eddie" Rosen, manager of the Orpheum theatre, South Haverhill, Mass., is quite a performer with the drums. Recently his drummer was sick for a week. Rosen substituted for him.

Harrison G. Heis, traveling auditor for the W. J. Eckert, Inc., Buffalo accountants, is now at work in the Boston office of the Warner Features, Inc.

F. J. Murphy, manager of the Boston office of the Warner Features, Inc., is planning to have a regular run-off day each week.

Canadian military authorities, who are searching for buried arms and ammunition on the Isle of Orleans in the St. Lawrence river, near Quebec, believed to have been hidden there by German spies acting as directors of a moving picture company, are likely to find nothing more than a few wooden guns and cannon made from cedar logs. A concrete base was discovered on the island on which a German siege gun might be mounted, and this caused the authorities to remember the various military operations of the Kalem Film Company, during the summer of 1913, in producing the battle on the Plains of Abraham, part of the conquest of Quebec, in which much ammunition was used. Francis West of No. 300 Central avenue, Malden, Mass., who was artistic director of the production, claims that the German spy is a huge joke. He claims that there was not a German in the company and that the only arms landed were cannon, which he himself made from cedar logs and carried from place to place for use in the battles. Mr. West tells of how the company engaged a number of men, including many Indians, and equipped them with antiquated rifles and a few new ones. All ammunition and arms was kept in a small building on the island. When the operations were nearly completed, an employe went into this building and lighted a cigarette. He was killed and most of the stock was ruined. Mr. West is surprised at the story. He says that the people must be "spy crazy" to get so excited over the finding of a concrete structure which might have been built for the foundation of any house.

Francis X. Bushman of the Essanay Company was the guest of E. J. Farrell, manager of the Boston office of the General Film Company at the Exhibitors' ball. Mr. Bushman visited the company's office in Commercial street.

ST. LOUIS.

As the building at the corner of the 3,200 block on Olive street is being demolished to make room for other improvements, the Mutascope theater, which occupied the lower floor of the structure, has been closed. The Mutascope was one of the pioneer moving picture theaters in St. Louis, and has been a profitable enterprise for its managers, Pohlman and Zimmerman, who also operate the Comet theater, at 2112 Market street.

Chas. J. Vollmer, who is managing the new Strand theater at Sixth and St. Charles streets, is also operating the Bernays theater, at Bernays and Harney avenues. He is looking about for a location for a big airdome on the north side, which he will open in time for the spring and summer business of 1915.

The Duchess theater, which was rebuilt from a Presbyterian Church at Grand and Washington avenues, opened on November 28 with C. H. Tabler in active management, and Chas. Freeland and George McDonald in the projecting room. A three-piece orchestra, that has earned an enviable reputation at Cicardi's restaurant, will furnish the music, and the show, which is continuous, runs from 12 noon till 11 o'clock at night.

The Yale Feature Film Exchange, managed by J. D. Bone, has moved from the Benoist building to 3931 Olive street.

Charles Werner has been appointed manager for the Box Office Attraction Company at 3632 Olive street, and N. F. Robinson, assistant manager.

The St. Louis Republic is printing the story of the new Universal serial, "The Master Key."

An industrial film showing the entire workings of a modern and up-to-date laundry was shown at the Empress theater on December 1 and 2, and on the afternoon of the second the entire force of the Colonial Laundry, where the pictures were made, were given a half holiday, and attended the theater in a body. E. W. Glauber, president of the Colonial Laundry Company, says that the educational publicity value of moving pictures rank second to newspapers, and his plan in showing the pictures is to give the thousands of laundry patrons a chance to see details of the actual work and sanitary conditions in a power laundry. The film was made by the St. Louis Motion Picture Company.

Six reels of pictures that are being shown under the patronage of the German Embassador at Washington began an engagement at the Garrick theater on November 29. The pictures are being shown as a benefit for the widows and orphans fund of the soldiers who have fallen in the present war. Four of the reels, which depict the life of Theodore Koerner, the German poet, were the gift of Emperor William, and the other two were presented by the King of Wuerttemberg, both donors stipulating that part of the receipts resulting from the exhibition of the pictures should be used as a fund for war sufferers. The pictures are shown four times daily, two and four o'clock in the afternoon, and seven and nine in the evening, with prices ranging from twenty-five to seventy-five cents a seat.

Richard Broderick, former manager of Warner's Features, at 3628 Olive street, has gone to Kansas City, where he will look after the interests of the same company.

J. M. Dubbs, former manager of the Union theater, at Union and Easton avenues, a well-known moving picture and theatrical man in the West, is operating a new enterprise, the St. Louis Poster Mounting Company. He deals direct with the film exchanges, and mounts anything in the poster line, from one to twenty-four sheet size. The business was started more than a year ago on a small scale, and has grown to such proportions that a large shop has been opened in the Duchess theatre building.

The Alco Film Exchange, which has opened at 3630 Olive street, is the latest addition to "Film Row," as the 3600 block on Olive street is now called, on account of the five large exchanges located there.

August Froebel, for several years connected with the St. Louis Motion Picture Company, 25th and Montgomery streets, has assumed charge of Warner's Features distributing branch at 3628 Olive street. Mr. Froebel is well known in theatrical, moving picture and general amusement circles throughout the West.

The Melvin theater, 2912-14 Chippewa street, is one of the handsomest new houses that have opened in St. Louis during the last few months. The house seats 600 and is of the very latest type of picture playhouse construction. Music is furnished by a $1,500 Wurlitzer seven-piece orchestra, and the projecting room, which is very wide and roomy, is equipped with an Edison, type D, and a late model Motiograph machine. John Billmeyer, who presides in the projecting room, is one of the oldest moving picture operators, in point of service, in the country, and was the first man to open a picture show west of Broadway, in St. Louis. The Melvin gives a five-reel Mutual program, with special features on Sunday, for five cents admission, and is owned by J. Halleman, and managed by A. Gutzman, who is a veteran in the local amusement world.

A campaign is being conducted in St. Louis moving picture theaters by three hundred women and girls, headed by Mrs. J. Whitworth Buck, for the annual sale of Red Cross Christmas stamps, for the benefit of the St. Louis Society for the Relief and Prevention of Tuberculosis. A reel of moving pictures under the title, "The Temple of Moolah," that depicts the ravages of tuberculosis among children, is used, and stamps are offered for sale in the lobbies of the theaters where the reel is being shown.

MISSOURI.

C. S. EDWARDS, who since the first of June has been the manager of the Kansas City office of the Eclectic Film Company, has been given the position of division manager. Mr. Edwards is one of the pioneers in the film business in Kansas City. He was interested in the old Yale Amusement Company, which at one time operated thirteen moving picture theaters in Kansas City. Later he was manager of the General Film Company's office in Kansas City. He gave this position up June 1 to take the managership of the Eclectic. His son, C. S. Edwards, Jr., succeeds him as manager. It might be said of Mr. Edwards, Jr., that he was born with a film in his mouth; at least he has been interested in the business since a boy, and when in high school he had some stock in the Yale Company, which was sold out to the General when that company opened offices in Kansas City. Mr. Edwards, Jr., has been assistant manager of the Eclectic since his father took charge June 1. The new assistant manager is F. N. Nine, formerly a representative for the General Film Company. Mr. Nine is well known in this territory and has made a great success in the business.

It has been reported in Kansas City that the World Feature Film Company is going to move from its present location in the Gloyd building to the third floor of the Ozark building. However, J. I. Scates, district manager of that company, and who has taken charge of the Kansas City office, is at the present time out of the city so no definite word has been given out.

The Alco Film Service of Missouri, which opened offices in the Gloyd building about two weeks ago, has closed the office and has taken the equipment back to St. Louis. No reason has been given for the action except that Kansas City business can be handled as well out of the St. Louis office as an office in Kansas City.

The Sedalia theater at Sedalia, Mo., did a good business with the "Industrialogs," which were shown Nov. 25-28 inclusive. The titles were: "The Dawn of Plenty," "The Dawn of Power" and "The Dawn of Commerce."

W. R. Winch, for many years a newspaper reporter in Kansas City, and later assistant manager of the Orpheum theater in Kansas City, and now a part owner in several moving picture theaters in El Paso and San Antonio, Tex., was in Kansas City recently.

The merchants of Harrisonville, Mo., have for many months been trying to devise some scheme by which they could attract more buyers into town on Saturday night. It was finally decided that the moving picture was the thing to do the work. The consequence is that the merchants have secured a complete equipment and on every Saturday night they will show high class comedies and educational pictures, pertaining to agriculture; every Saturday night free of charge to all those that care to attend.

The Crystal theater at St. Joseph, Mo., showed the pictures of the Ford automobile factory recently.

Frank L. Newman, manager of the Royal theater in Kansas City, Mo., has been confined to his home for several days on account of a very severe cold.

The Willis Wood theater, which ran "The Christian" for a week, did an immense business with it. There was not a night during its exhibition in Kansas City that crowds did not stand in the foyer waiting for the show to end so that they might get seats. Thanksgiving day was the biggest day that the house has ever known since its construction fourteen years ago.

KANSAS.

A SPECIAL matinee was given at the Iris theater in Topeka, Kan., for the Belgian relief fund. Elizabeth Ann was the cashier for the day and Manager H. Grady Montgomery turned the entire proceeds over to her, not taking out for expenses. She will personally give the money to the Kansas Belgian Relief Committee. Several musical numbers were rendered by local singers and musicians in conjunction with the pictures.

"Cabiria" was run at the Grand theater in Topeka, Kan., all last week. Several of the large stores gave tickets to the show to their first twenty costumers of the day. It is stated that the pictures had an excellent run and received many praising comments.

A motion picture theater in Hutchinson is being constructed especially for negroes.

The Gem theater in Olathe, Kan., will be ready Dec. 1. A new structure, 35 feet from basement to roof, has been added to the rear. This improvement cost Mr. Ogg, the owner, $3,000 and makes the theater the most complete in the city.

S. E. Willcutts, who filed suit against the Hip theater, Topeka, Kan., in regard to the distribution of prizes in a contest recently, has dismissed his case without prejudice.

The Parent Teachers' organization of Lawrence, Kan., has gone on record as favoring local censorship. They favor censors appointed by the school board and officials of local clubs.

The Crystal theater at Hays City, Kan., has found that its patrons like serials. As a consequence it is running "Lucille Love" every Monday and the "Perils of Pauline" every Thursday.

The Iris theater in Topeka, Kan., did a fine business on the Paramount release, "The Circus Man." The Iris is now charging 10 and 20 cents and report a good business.

The Hippodrome theater at Leavenworth, Kan., made a genuine hit with its patrons recently when it showed Governor Cox of Ohio and the state legislature of Ohio in the two-reel feature, "A Man of the Hour."

PHILADELPHIA.

THE Public Service Electric Company has been ordered by the Board of Public Utility Commissioners of New Jersey to put a new schedule of rates for supplying current for moving picture arcs, in Paterson, N. J., into effect not later than December 17. The order of the board is the result of complaints made by eleven proprietors of Paterson moving picture houses who charged that the rates now being charged by the electric company were unreasonable and unjust. After the investigation of the allegations of the motion picture men the state board came to the conclusion that they were right and issued an order that the following rates would be just and reasonable: First step—Ten cents per kw. hr. for consumption in each month up to and including an amount equal to 75 kw. hrs. per hour per horsepower of connected load; second step—Five cents per kw. hr. for the consumption each month in excess of the consumption mentioned in the first step, and, a minimum charge of $1 a month per horsepower of connected load.

Eagle Temple, Broad and Spring Garden Streets, Philadelphia, was the scene of the first ball and entertainment given by the Lubin Photo Players, on Wednesday night, December 2. Hundreds of couples were present and enjoyed the ten vaudeville acts presented by the stars of the film-makers. The casts included Arthur Johnson, Lottie Briscoe, Ethel Clayton, Lillie Leslie, Joseph Smiley and George Terwilliger.

Authur MacAllister has been dismissed as an inspector of moving picture theatres, a $2,000 position that comes under the supervision of the Board of Mercantile Appraisers. Auditor General Powell and Fred A. Van Valkenburg, in dismissing MacAllister, said that there was work for but two inspectors, although there were three such positions.

Mr. Etris, formerly in charge of the Eclectic Film Company, of Philadelphia, where he had an enviable record, will shortly begin his duties as manager of the World Film Corporation, also in that city. Mr. Etris succeeds G. Beihoff.

In order to bring the people of the vicinity in closer touch with their house and to stem the tide of depression which is current everywhere the price of admission to the Coliseum moving picture theatre at 60th and Market Streets, Philadelphia, will be lowered to five cents.

In a general order issued recently to the police by Superintendent Robinson, all contests or prize drawings conducted by the proprietors of motion picture theatres or other places of amusement, either by means of tickets sold at the door, tickets presented inside or other devices were held to be lotteries and therefore in violation of the law. The order states that all such contests and price drawings must cease absolutely on Tuesday, December 15, or the offending proprietors will be prosecuted.

The Plaza Theatre on the east side of Broad Street, between Ritner and Porter, lot 180 feet by 80 feet, assessed at $20,000, together with the Century Theatre at the northeast corner of Erie Avenue and Marshall Street, lot 72 feet by 143 feet, assessed at $50,000, have been sold to Albert M. Greenfield, representing the Active Real Estate Company, by Maurice Spiers, who was represented on the transaction by Edmund J. Bamberger. The seating capacity of the Plaza Theatre is 1,600 and of the Century 1,200.

By a recent change in the policy of the management of the Grand Theatre of Trenton N. J., burlesque will be shown only four days a week and feature photoplays on the other two days. The days selected for the showing of the pictures are Mondays and Tuesdays, on which occasions "first run" feature films will be exhibited, together with "Pathe's Weekly."

Louis Breitinger, the chief of the Board of Censors, in reply to a question as to whether there would be any possibility of the six sheets ever decorating the front of a picture theatre again, replied that after January 15 all those wishing to display posters of the six-sheet size woud have to deliver them to the Board of Censors' office to have them censored, and if approved, they could be displayed in front of theatres.

"NEPTUNE'S DAUGHTER" was re-engaged for another week at His Majesty's, the big West End "legitimate" house. This theater would have been "dark" had it not been for the big returns this film brought in. The success attained by that film prompted the management to screen other big features, and the result is that "S. R. O." business has been the rule ever since. "England's Menace" and "England Expects" have been the other attractions, and "Thirty Leagues Under the Sea" was shown the week of November 30. Clergymen and school teachers were admitted free on Monday and Tuesday. On Wednesday, Thursday and Friday special after-school performances were given after the regular matinee so that school children could have an opportunity of viewing this instructive film. "After the Ball" is scheduled for the week of December 7.

Over four thousand dollars was obtained for charitable purposes at the special benefit performance held on the evening of November 26 at the Imperial theater.

When the Moving Picture World correspondent dropped into Warner's Features office recently, he had an interesting chat with Mr. Feldstein, the general manager for Canada, and Mr. Fischer, the local manager. Both gentlemen have long been together in the local film game. A large renovating plant is due to be installed shortly in the ample quarters, and an exhibiting room is being fitted up. Business is good in the branches throughout Canada.

A. R. McBeath, the popular manager of the local Mutual Film Corporation office, is pleased with business. Mr. McBeath reports that Thanhouser's serial, "Zudora," which is running in story form in the Montreal Star, is breaking all records.

The Noted Players Feature Film Company, 902 Birks' (New) Bldg., have found their present quarters inadequate for the business they are doing, and intend to move into larger offices in the same building. Mr. Sourkes, the manager, claims good business.

The Consolidated Film Company has opened a branch office in Sydney, Nova Scotia. H. L. Beaman has it under his care, and prospects should look rosy for this company in the Maritime provinces. Mr. Cross, the general manager at the firm's headquarters in Montreal, is pleased with results. He has just received an interesting topical subject from England, showing scenes taken on board the transports of the members of the First Contingent.

Z. Renaud, Jr., who opened the Strand theater, has severed his connections, having sold his interests to the Indepednent Amusements, Ltd. It is said that this gentleman and a number of local financiers are planning to open a theater in the near future.

The All-Red Weekly, a Canadian topical, has been booked for the Tivoli.

"Spartacus" was screened at the New Grand for three days last week. Results pleased the management. The Eclair Weekly is being shown at this house.

D. McRae is now managing the Casino theater. Mr. McRae was formerly with the Edison people, having installed the Kinetophone in many Canadian theaters. He is pleased with results at the Casino. The big Kleine subjects are going strong.

"The Master Key" has been booked at these local theaters: Strand, Midway, Globe, Tivoli, Mount Royal, Family.

"Zudora" is being shown at the following Montreal photoplay houses: Midway, Tivoli, New Grand, Family, Moulin Rouge, Globe, Victoria, Mount Royal.

Admiration for the way the Quebec Board of Moving Picture Censors do their work and the system that is followed here, has been freely expressed by A. Chadbourn, the chairman of the Alberta Board of Censors, who has just spent a few days in this city studying Board of Censors matters. Mr. Chadbourn was met by Sheriff Lemieux, the president of the Quebec Board, and given every facility for inquiring into those matters which concern the work of the censors. Before he left Montreal, Mr. Chadbourn declared that the Quebec system was so thorough that the Western Province had much to learn from Quebec, and many of the reforms established here will be put in operation in Alberta in the near future.

It seems quite evident that the local censors, acting on the precedent set by the Ontario Censors a few weeks ago, will condemn pictures showing the horrors of war. A picture has just been called to my attention which was "killed" because it might prove an obstacle to recruiting as it showed the dark side of war.

The Strand War Series are becoming more and more popular at the Francis. Mr. Hooley is putting up good shows and is well rewarded by large and appreciating audiences.

There are big doings around the Allfeatures office these days. Mr. Malone, the manager, has had the quarters extended, and intends to enlarge them still further. An Allfeatures office has just been opened in Winnipeg, and is under the charge of Les. Kaufman.

Music at the New Grand will in future be furnished by a ladies' seven-piece orchestra. The orchestra was brought on from Boston and proved a success from the very first. The management has had some splendid features of late, and "Zudora" is doing good business.

The Imperial Animated Song Pictures are proving a success at the Tivoli. Mr. English reports good business. "Zudora" and "The Master Key" are bringing in good returns.

GALLAGHER.

CINCINNATI.

WAR on tuberculosis via the moving picture route, which is becoming increasingly popular nowadays for about every conceivable purposes, from advertising to education and social propoganda, is planned by the Cincinnati branch of the Anti-Tuberculosis League. "The Temple of Moloch," a photoplay produced under the auspices of the National Association for the Study and Prevention of Tuberculosis, will be used by the local organization in a number of local theaters in supplementing the campaign for the annual distribution of Red Cross Christmas seals for the purpose of aiding in the Association's work, as well as in impressing information regarding the danger of the disease.

The Famous Players' production of the ever-popular farce, "The Man from Mexico," featuring John Barrymore, drew heavily at the Orpheum last week, being one of the best things of the season, and quite the best of the week. Other leading attractions on the Paramount program, as well as of independent production and distribution, are scheduled for Orpheum audiences during the coming weeks, and the management has followed the idea of getting out a weekly program, so that people may know in advance what is coming. The program is in card form, with a loop of string attached, in order that the suggestion printed on it, "Hang this up for reference," may be convenitnely followed. One side lists the week's attractions, one for every day, and on the other appears other information, including the names of coming attractions the dates of which have not been announced. The first issue of the program came out last week.

A lingering misunderstanding of the "war tax" on photoplay houses, probably born out of a hope that it would not be imposed, was dissipated in the minds of Cincinnati exhibitors last week when an announcement came direct from headquarters at Washington to the effect that those who failed to pay their proper tax on December 1 would be in imminent danger of being closed up. A disgruntled line of moving picture men therefore appeared at the local office of the Collector of Internal Revenue and paid their taxes, ranging from $25 for the small houses, seating 250 or less, up to the several which had to pay $100 on a seating capacity of 800 or more.

The "visatures," or moving picture lectures, shown at the University of Cincinnati on various educational subjects, are growing more popular daily. A regular schedule has been worked out for the daily pictures, which are shown during the noon hour, in order that people engaged in work may still see them and derive the benefit resulting from them. It is sligthly inaccurate to refer to the pictures as lectures, inasmuch as they are literally the whole show, being self-explanatory and thus rendering an oral lecture unnecessary. Last week most of the pictures were of a vocational nature, the program being as follows: Mondays, stock raising; Tuesday, fruit growing; Wednesday, the canning industry; Thursday, the wool industry; Friday, scenes in the Northwest.

Plans are under way, according to information which got out last week, for another big photoplay house on Price Hill, at the southeast corner of Warsaw and Enright avenues. The lot on which it is said arrangements have been made for the construction of the house is ample in size, measuring 96 by 110 feet, and being valued at $5,000. Details will be announced later.

Instances continue to multiply of the omnipresence and limitless usefulness of the moving picture. The widespread outbreak of the foot and mouth disease which has already caused such enormous losses to stock-growers, would seem to give little chance for the operation of moving pictures, as the subject is certainly not amusing nor edifying; but last week at Dayton, O., where a herd of 90 cattle, with 80 hogs and 50 sheep were destroyed on the farm of George Sauer, all phases of the work were taken in by moving picture operators, for use all over the country in the prosecution of Federal and tSate work against the progress of the disease which is threatening the coutnry's meat supply.

Another Ohio man has made good in the field of the scenario writer, in the person of Hugh Weir, formerly a reporter of Springfield, O., and now a well-known writer of stories as well as of photoplays. His "Mystery of the Green Umbrella," in which Alice Joyce, as the girl detective, scored one of the hits of the series in which she is appearing. The film was shown recently at the Alhambra, in Springfield, and drew usually well on account of the local interest in Mr. Weir, who now lives at Washington C. H., O.

Hillsboro, O., is to be immortalized via the moving film route, the rather unusual idea being adopted of making a picture with a somewhat connected plot, if it can be called that, under the name of "Peace in America—Good Will to Men." Schap, the Keith comeraman, who has had wide experience in taking town motion pictures, will do the work, twenty local merchants making the film possible. It will be exhibited locally and in surrounding towns. CASEY.

Members of the West Allis Woman's Club of West Allis had as a lesson subject at a recent meeting "The Danger and Value of the Motion Picture and Popular Song."

G. R. Comer, who formerly conducted the Gem theater at Grand Rapids, Minn., is now manager of a moving picture show at Augusta, Wis., in which he and T. R. Dodgson of Nashwauk are interested.

The publicity committee of the Commercial Club at Superior has been instructed to raise a fund of $4,000 for the purpose of making 2,000 feet of industrial moving pictures of Superior to be shown at the Panama-Pacific exposition.

The finance committee of the board of edution at Milwaukee has recommended an appropriation of $3,500 for the purpose of obtaining rare slides and films for use in the educational work of the public museum and schools.

The Wisconsin Industrial Commission probably will make its moving picture safety-first campaign state wide. At Milwaukee 7,000 workers saw the accident-prevention films, at Oshkosh three capacity shows were given and in Superior 400 were turned away. The interest shown leads to plans for extension of the educational work.

Knights of Pythias of Beloit had a number of deserving children of the city as guests for a Thanksgiving dinner and the same crowd saw "The Trey o' Hearts" at the holiday matinee at the Rex theater.

Martin Young of Glenwood has purchased the moving picture theater at Tabor from his brother-in-law, J. M. Bennett.

ARTHUR TRUMAN'S WARD (Dec. 21).—On her way to visit her newly-appointed guardian, whom she has never seen, Helen Russell is struck by an automobile and seriously injured. She is taken into a small bakery shop where Lillian Hardman, an orphan is employed. Lillian does all possible for the girl. After her removal to a hospital, Lillian finds a suitcase the officers had left behind, in which is a letter and papers from Arthur Truman, Helen's guardian. Learning from a newspaper that the girl unidentified has died, Lillian sees an opportunity to take the dead girl's place, pretend to be Helen Russell and leave the distasteful life of drudgery in the bakery. She accordingly carries out her plans, and finds Arthur Truman a decidedly prepossessing young man. He is struck by her beauty, and never doubting but what she is Helen, the girl's deception is successful. She proves very awkward in society and causes so much comment by her amusing unconventionality, he sends her to a finishing school. Arthur gradually learns to love Lillian and on her return from school, plans to propose to her. Meanwhile, the report of Helen's death proves incorrect as she does not die, but upon her recovery, it is found her mind is a blank concerning her past. She secures work in a department store, and one day Lillian meets Helen on the street and recognizes her. She follows Helen, learns her address, then goes straight to Arthur and confesses her deception. He is astounded and finds it hard to believe her, until he meets Helen, who has recovered her memory and learns the truth. Lillian starts quietly packing up, and Arthur begins to realize that he cannot let her go. Lillian tells him she can stay no longer as she is not his ward and, holding out his arms, he asks her to 'stay as his wife.' She runs to him quickly and buries her face on his shoulder, as his arms close about her.

BY THE GOVERNOR'S ORDER (Special—Two Parts—Dec. 22).—Because of his father's poverty, Cyrus Howard, a wealthy retired business man, objects to Allan Lawrence's attentions to his (Howard's) daughter, Ethel. The young people then elope to the city, where they are obliged to live very economically, but they are too proud to ask assistance of their parents, and for a while are very happy. Unfortunately, Allan loses his position through befriending Nolan, an escaped convict, and Ethel gives birth to a child amid conditions of great poverty. She finally writes her father for help, and during a quarrel between the latter and Howard, she dies from shock. Allan, in a mad fury, attempts to shoot Howard, and is arrested on the charge of assault with intent to kill. Mr. Lawrence cares for Hope, his little granddaughter and learns that his son has been sentenced to ten years in prison. Six years later, Hope—living with Mr. Lawrence—is gradually winning the heart of Cyrus Howard, whose home is nearby. Nolan is convicted of another offense and made a cell-mate of Allan's. The two escape from prison shortly after Lawrence has gone to plead with the Governor for his son's pardon. Allan reaches home on Christmas day, but is seen by the village police officer. Howard and Mr. Lawrence—now on friendly terms—have arranged a good old-fashioned Christmas for Hope, with Santa Claus disguise, and all the trimmings. Allan climbs in a porch window, Hope comes upstairs and the officer knocks at the door. Rendered desperate, Allan puts on the Santa Claus suit and Hope finds him. She joyously leads him downstairs just as the officer enters. Everyone is astounded and seeing he is trapped, Allan confesses. He is about to be taken back to jail when a telegram arrives from the Governor announcing that Allan has been pardoned. This saves the situation, Allan is at once released and a happy family reunion follows.

THE PROFESSOR'S ROMANCE (Dec. 23).—The Honorable John Cameron, Minister of Labor, is working hard to complete the investigation which is his life's effort. The widow Merrileigh and her two children settle down in the house next door. Trouble commences at once. The youngsters allow a stray baseball to land in Cameron's soup-plate and he starts over to the widow's house to demand reparation. The widow tells Cameron that "mother's little angels" were simply playing, and apologizes. As he goes out, the children, with anything but "angelic" looks, declare war on the Honorable John Cameron. Hostilities commence at once. They set off a giant fire-racker on the porch, and when Cameron again complains, she gently chides them, saying, "I fear they need a father's firm hand." Cameron and the widow almost unconsciously fall in love, and when his great work is finished, he invites the widow and her children to a little celebration. It proves quite a celebration, all right, and after some particularly distressing incidents with a garden hose, the "angels," Cameron and Sophronia, are soaking wet. The widow begins to have a slight suspicion her children are not the "angels" she had supposed. The climax comes when the youngsters steal his precious manuscript and are found gleefully dancing around a bonfire. Cameron is heartbroken, and although he accepts the widow's proffered sympathy and apologies, feels he can never forgive her children. Her gentle sympathy awakens his love and realizing that his work is not the only thing in life, takes her unresisting in his arms. At this moment, the children enter with the precious manuscript, and announce that they had only hidden it for a joke, so all ends in complete happiness, but we feel certain that the "angels" will have a strong hand to guide their future destinies.

THE KNIGHT BEFORE CHRISTMAS (Dec. 24).—Before leaving to spend Christmas at his Aunt Kate's, Daddy Jim gives Sonny a dollar and tells him to buy whatever he most desires for himself. Arrived at Auntie's, he is immediately initiated into the new game, "Santa Claus," by the five "imps," Aunt Kate's children. She prevents an incipient quarrel by reciting "The Night Before Christmas," then she tells them about the knights of old, and Sonny learns for the first time that a knight is one who always helps damsels in distress. Being pacified, and their minds dwelling upon Aunt Kate's recitals, they all go quietly to bed. Next day, while Christmas shopping, Sonny strolls away and gets lost in a big department store. He wanders out into the street, where he meets little Annie O'Reilly, who promptly leads the sobbing boy home, saying she will find his Auntie. Sonny is rather frightened at the squalid aspect of the tenement where the O'Reilly's live, but finding Annie has no money to buy Christmas presents, he remembers what Auntie had said about knights, and gives the little girl his dollar, which he had intended to buy a little baby brother with. He is taken to the police station, where Aunt Kate finds him, and there is great rejoicing. The O'Reilly's are invited to Aunt Kate's Christmas party and that night is one of anticipation for them. Christmas Day, in the midst of a general jollification, Aunt Kate receives a telegram from Daddy Jim saying there is a live present waiting at home for Sonny. Everyone is highly pleased and congratulations are in order. When Sonny gets home and sees the tiny baby, he exclaims anxiously, "Is he a Dollar Baby, Daddy Jim? He don't look like more than Five Cents' worth."

SWEENY'S CHRISTMAS BIRD (Dec. 25).—The Sweeneys live in the flat above the Clancys. Mrs. Sweeney makes the sad discovery that Caesar, her parrot, is dead. Mike, her husband, starts to give the bird "decent burial" and stops for a bracer at the corner cafe. There he meets Clancy going home with his newly-purchased Christmas turkey. The two men imbibe several drinks and are soon a little befuddled, with the result that they get their packages mixed. Mike buries Clancy's turkey, while Clancy goes home with the dead parrot. When Mrs. Clancy sees the dead polly, she throws it at her husband and soon there is a grand row. Upstairs, the Sweeney's declare, "The Clancy's are at it again!" Sweeney tells his wife he will get a turk and have it sent home. Clancy, standing near the dumbwaiter, happens to overhear this. When the boy sends up the bird on the dumbwaiter, Clancy opens the little door in his apartment, yanks it off, leaves the dead parrot in its place and hides Sweeney's turkey in the cellar. Mrs. Sweeney almost faints when she opens the package and poor dead Caesar greets her eyes. She seizes a flatiron, stands by the door and awaits her husband's return. Meanwhile, Mrs. Clancy sends her husband to buy another turkey. He smiles to himself, takes the money and celebrates with it. At the saloon he meets Clancy and Sweeney wins a pig at a raffle. When they reach home, he tells his friend Clancy to carry the animal upstairs to his apartment, while he goes down in the cellar, only to find his bird has disappeared. Clancy opens Sweeney's door and is at once assaulted by the latter's wife, who thinks it is her husband. The two couples get into a fight and the result is they are all arrested. The magistrate gives them the alternative of "The pig for your Christmas bird—or ten days." The following day all four sit down at the table in Sweeney's parlor and enjoy a feast of roast pig.

AN AFFAIR FOR THE POLICE (Special—Two Parts—Dec. 26).—While preparing for her wedding, Yvonne Whelen engages the services of Al Shannon, a private detective, to guard her wedding presents. Her sister, Mrs. Van Austin, thinks it an indirect insult to the guests, but Yvonne is determined to have the protection. After the ceremony, to everyone's surprise and consternation, an almost priceless necklace disappears. For a while all is confusion, then the guests are searched without result, and every one is more puzzled than ever. Next day, upon suggestions of Miss Scott, Shannon's female assistant, an "at home" dinner is planned. A double plot is laid to trap the guilty one. Miss Scott places a valuable scarf-pin and a pendant on a dresser in such a way that the thief will leave a clue to his or her identity. She then disguises herself as a maid while Shannon makes up as butler. At dinner, they get a clue which leads to the home of the Van Austins, where, no one being home but the maid, the two detectives steal upstairs and the pin and locket are soon brought to light. Miss Scott quietly tells Yvonne, and she returns with the lady detective to the Van Austin home. Yvonne is bewildered. What does it all mean? She soon finds out when the detectives openly accuse Mrs. Van Austin. To everyone's amazement, that lady and her husband burst out laughing, and the whole affair is explained. She had just taken the jewels to prove it could be done, notwithstanding the presence of the detectives, who feel pretty cheap to be caught napping. The incident furnishes a sprightly topic of conversation for a long while afterwards.

KALEM.

THE MAYOR'S SECRETARY (Special—Two Parts—Dec. 21).—Aided by the Women's League, Chandler, the reform candidate for mayor, is elected to office. Fearing lest he fall under the influence of Winton, a crooked "boss," the members of the Women's League have Alma Dare, one of their number, appointed Chandler's secretary. Suspecting the girl of being a spy, Winton endeavors to secure her friendship. Alma pretends to respond to his overtures and thus secures a document lost by the boss. This exposes a plot to hoodwink the mayor and defraud the city by means of a joker in a paving contract.

Winton's suspicions are aroused, however, and he cleverly entraps Alma, making her a prisoner in the home of a henchman. The brave girl escapes after knocking her jailer unconscious. She returns to the mayor's office just as Chandler is about to sign the contract. A note passed to him by his secretary warns the mayor and he refuses to affix his signature to the paper. Unknown to the mayor, Alma has had a hole bored through the wall leading from the outer office to the mayor's chamber. This is concealed by a bookcase. Balked by the mayor's stand, Winton attempts to force him to sign the contract at pistol's point. A voice causes him to turn. Alma, leveling a revolver through the hole in the wall, baffles the desperate boss. Winton's influence is broken forever. Chandler learns of Alma's adventures and of how she has guarded him from the boss's machinations. Taking her in his arms, he begs her to become his wife.

THE ESCAPE ON THE LIMITED (Seventh of "The Hazards of Helen" Series—Dec. 26).—Brandt, a defaulting cashier, hides in Lone Point in his effort to throw detectives off his track. Shortly after his arrival, the defaulter witnesses the destruction of a farmer's wagon by a passenger train. In taking up a collection for the unfortunate man, Brandt meets Helen, the telegraph operator. Sheridan, a detective, discovers the criminal's whereabouts. He wires Helen to hold Brandt until he can come up from the city. Brandt gets wind of this, however. After cutting the wires of Helen's telephone to prevent her from phoning for help, the defaulter binds and gags the girl. Boarding the outgoing limited, Brandt makes his escape.

Sheridan arrives a few minutes later. Helen, who has managed to grasp the disconnected 'phone with her feet, attracts the detective's attention by hurling it through the window. Sheridan liberates the girl. The two get into a gasoline speeder standing on the sidetrack. Helen drives the car at a furious speed in her effort to overtake the limited. The conductor of the flyer sees the girl's signals just as the train is crossing a deep cut. Knowing capture stares him in the face, Brandt jumps off the train. He strikes the embankment with terrific force. When Helen and Sheridan come upon their quarry, they find Brandt dead.

THE REFORMATION OF HAM (Dec. 25).—Ham and Shorty are sailors on the good ship Phillalloo, anchored off Kulangsu, China. Ham's great weakness is his effort to drink the waterfront saloons dry. To break him of his drinking habit, Shorty places a dozen snakes in his shipmate's bunk. The resultant scare sobers Ham. He forgets all about the snakes, however, when he goes ashore the following day. It being a national holiday, he and Shorty celebrate. Purchasing some fireworks, the shipmates enter a Chinese saloon. Their singing annoys a band of Chinese pirates. Perceiving this, Ham and Shorty bombard the bandits with skyrockets, bombshells and Roman candles.

A free-for-all fight ensues. The pirates attack the two sailors, only to be repulsed by the beer bottles wielded by Ham and Shorty. The ruction attracts the shipmates of the battling seamen and the reinforcements cause the Chinamen to beat a hasty retreat. The sailors pursue, but meet with the rest of the pirate band. The tars prove victorious after a furious battle. Triumphant, they celebrate in proper fashion. Back aboard the Phillalloo, Ham refuses to sober up. Once more Shorty resorts to the snakes. Convinced drinking has affected his brain, Ham makes a bee-line for the sick bay. The surgeon has been tipped off by Shorty and places Ham in bed. There is no doubt as to whether the man is cured when he finally leaves the ship's hospital. When Shorty offers him a drink, Ham seizes the bottle and heaves it over the side.

THE FATAL OPAL (Special—Two Parts—Dec. 23).—Knowing his uncle dislikes Alice, Frank Morton keeps his marriage to her a secret from Judge Morton. Just before the wedding, Frank purchases an opal stickpin, which is reputed to have brought misfortune upon its previous owners. Sandy McGee, a desperate criminal, who had been sent to prison by Judge Morton, makes his escape. Thirsting for revenge, the man disguises himself and secures a position in the judge's household as butler. In a quarrel between Frank and his uncle, the young man loses his stickpin. It is later found by the judge, who carelessly fastens it in his coat lapel.

McGee's chance comes when the servants have their night off. Alone in the house with Judge Morton, McGee binds his victim and then discloses his identity. The man fiendishly plans to bring about the judge's death by asphyxiation. Before he dies, Judge Morton contrives to free his hands and wrists. With the aid of Frank's stickpin, he scrawls the murderer's name on the cover of a book.

The murder is discovered by the following morning. Frank is accused and due to entries in his uncle's diary telling of the quarrels, is convicted. The message on the book remains undiscovered. Alice makes her home in the Morton mansion. In idly scanning the books in the library, she comes upon Judge Morton's dying message. While officers listen outside the door, Alice succeeds in getting McGee intoxicated. Believing her to be madly in love with him, the criminal confesses his crime. He is immediately placed under arrest. Frank is freed and returns home. He comes upon the opal. Recalling the evil history of the jewel, Frank forever destroys its power by casting it into the flames.

THE WINNING WHISKERS (Dec. 22).—Lizzie dotes on lurid literature. She would sooner read a good dime novel than eat. While her mistress believes Lizzie at work, the cook is deeply engrossed in reading the following story: Stella, the beyootiful heiress, loves Billy. U. Knave, her guardian, like all dime novel guardians, objects to the match. Ima Crook, who has a hold upon Knave, demands the hand of Stella as the price of his silence. Although Stella cries a river of tears, flooding her room and compelling her pet bear to swim for life. Knave commands her to wed Crook.

Crook calls upon Stella's guardian. Billy, peering into the room through the window, hears them send Bloodfoot, Crook's assistant, for a minister. Billy's chance comes later, when Crook is alone in the room. Knocking the villain senseless, Billy disguises himself by shaving off Crook's eyebrows and whiskers and pasting them on his own face.

Stella knows of her lover's ruse. The minister enters and the two are wed. Shortly after Billy and Stella leave the house, Crook revives. Believing Knave has played a trick upon him, the villain engages the man in a duel. Both plug each other squarely through the heart, when—— Lizzie's mistress enters the room. A box on the ear sends the cook back to her pots and pans, while her cherished book feeds the furnace.

THE ADVENTURE OF THE WRONG SANTA CLAUS (Twelfth of the Octavius—Amateur Detective Series Dec. 21).—Time hung heavily on the hands of Octavius, for no new problems that presented themselves for his massive intellect to unravel. He felt somewhat discouraged with things generally when suddenly the morning mail brought a piece of news which was destined to lead him into the most extraordinary adventure of his entire career. In short, it was an invitation from his friends, Mr. and Mrs. Randall, to pay them a holiday visit and to play the part of Santa Claus at the children's Christmas party. Octavius accepted the invitation with enthusiasm, and repaired to a toy shop where he invested in a complete Santa Claus outfit. He arrived at the Randall's just in time for dinner. Christmas greetings were exchanged and all was merriment, they little dreaming that an unwelcome guest, in the person of a burglar, was slipping into the house as they ate. The arrival of Grace Randall added to the merriment of all, and it was very evident that her personality made an immediate impression upon Octavius.

In the meantime, the burglar had made his way to the floor above. Listening to the happy voices in the hall, he overheard Mrs. Randall telling Octavius that a complete Santa Claus outfit was hanging in the closet of the spare room. The burglar immediately decided to use the costume as a disguise. Octavius, on the other hand, decided to wear his own outfit and just as he was admiring its general effect in the mirror, the burglar entered his room and knocked him senseless. Safe in his disguise, the footpad passed quickly to the lower floor and escaped from the house with all of the Christmas presents.

Octavius regained his senses, only to find himself securely locked in, but at last he attracted the attention of his friends and was quickly released. In the midst of the story, Mrs. Randall discovered that the presents were stolen. Octavius started at once upon the trail and succeeded in overtaking his quarry just as he was boarding the train for the city. Climbing into the moving train, Octavius proceeded to attack the burglar, but was restrained by the train crew. He waited, however, until the train should arrive in the city, and after many failures, succeeded in capturing the basket with which he returned to the Randall home, triumphant. His welcome was an enthusiastic one and the understanding between him and Grace was so apparent that Mr. and Mrs. Randall crept out of the room, leaving them a free field. The children, however, were more curious and were the happy witnesses of the final capitulation of Octavius, detective.

OLIVE IS DISMISSED (Fifth of "Olive's Opportunities" Series—Dec. 22).—Vance Coleman fully makes up his mind to marry Olive, and while Madame Forresti is dining, her spiritual adviser, the bishop, Vance tells her of his resolve. The Madame and his lordship caution Vance against marrying so wild and ungovernable a creature. Olive overhears them and on the impulse of the moment decides to leave, as she is a source of trouble and is anxious to earn her own living. Mrs. March, a frivolous society woman, sees Olive wandering along with her monkey and violin, and thinking the gypsy would be a novelty for a social entertainment, offers Olive a home in her establishment.

Mr. March, an elderly man, is a lover of books and the fireside. His tastes are so divergent from those of his wife that quarrels are the frequent result. Olive soon feels how a separation will be the issue of this discordance. Freddie Carrington, a silly society idol, imagines

Mrs. March unhappy and makes love to her, which she gradually permits, and they finally agree to elope. To balk this scheme, Olive, at the moment that suits her purpose, snuggles up into Mr. March's arms, with the excuse that a mote is in her eyes. The old man unconsciously tries to help her. Mrs. March appears in the doorway, and sees this seeming compromising position. With rage, she seizes Olive by the collar, literally throws her out of the house, and then returns to her husband to whom she begins to administer the little attentions that Olive had taught her. Olive appears at the window grinning, gladdened of having brought the silly wife back to her husband's arms. Olive resolves to seek elsewhere the means of livelihood.

'TWAS THE NIGHT BEFORE CHRISTMAS (Dec. 23).—In his workshop, Santa Claus, helped by gnomes, is packing toys into great sacks, with which he loads his sleigh. Wearied by his love toil, he mounts the sleigh, and the deer whisk him over the snow fields to the roof of the cottage. He descends the chimney, and fills with toys a pair of stockings, extra long, hanging near the fireplace. As he mounts the flue, a wee lad steals into the room, looks up the chimney at the departing Santa, and joyously clambers after him. The boy reaches the roof at the moment the sleigh starts, and perches behind it. He notes every house where Santa lavishes gifts, and heedless of the nipping night air, stays lodged behind the sleigh, until Santa returns to his toy shop.

Gazing through the window, the child sees Santa drowsily take off his wet shoes and stockings, hang the latter near the fire to dry, and go to his bedroom, where the Sandman waits for him. The lad enters, looks at the empty stockings, and grieving at the thought that big-hearted Santa had not kept a gift for himself, determines to repay his generosity. The lad is borne on the wings of the night to his home, where he picks out a dainty gift, and flies through the crisp air to an American nursery, wherein three children are asleep. He rouses them, tells them how Santa Claus has no Christmas gift, and the children, moved to pity, select their most cherished belonging, and go with the lad out into the night to far-off Germany, where they enlist two more tiny recruits for the journey. Before long, they gather companions from Italy, Spain, Holland, from all countries, even from the Land of the Midnight Sun, and they all skim through the air to Santa's home, and swarm into his toy shop where, in great glee, they hurry and fill his stockings with their gifts and heap presents by the fire. Santa, awakened by the commotion, comes in upon his little well-wishers and gleams at the bulging stockings and the sight of offerings on the floor. The children swarm around him and climb all over him, and Santa feels that, indeed, it is a Merry Christmas.

THE TIP OF THE DARK CONTINENT (Capetown, South Africa, and Its Vicinity (Dec. 23).—To readers familiar with Kaffir troubles in South Africa in the early nineteenth century, the Boer rebellion of 1815, the discovery of diamonds in 1867, and the Boer War of a few years ago, this picture will recall memories of what they have read authentically, and have pictured in their minds' eye only. Capetown is seen panoramically, and a splendid view of Table Mountain is given. How thriving the town is is proved by a vista of Addezley street, the main thoroughfare.

Capetown ladies and female transients patronize the flower shops, when leisure does not allow them to seek the fields and suburban stretches dotted with remarkable variety and abundance of flowers. Only a pittance is asked by the florist for a bouquet of good size and exquisite blossoms. Breakers are shown at Sea Point, a twenty minutes' drive from Capetown. A view is given of the home of Cecil Rhodes, the "Father of South Africa." It is now used as the residence of the Premier of South Africa. The Cape of Good Hope seen from land and from the deck of a whaler will interest especially young students of geography.

THE PREMATURE COMPROMISE (Second of "Young Lord Stranleigh" Series—Special—Two Parts—Dec. 25).—Schwartzbrod and his gang, after prevailing upon MacKeller and his son to take up the floating of their mining stock, tries to get it away from them, but through the pleading of MacKeller, and the strategy of Stranleigh, the latter is able to recover all the stock, and an additional thirty thousand, which the syndicate brokers had oversold. Schwartzbrod, furious over this set-back, conceives the idea of using the syndicate's steamer, which he is entitled to, until the transfer of sale has been made. Lord Stranleigh, meanwhile, instructs MacKeller to get the steamer in readiness to sail on instant notice to the mine. MacKeller's son presents his credentials to the captain of the ship, and begins to superintend the loading of the boat. Johnson, a tool of the syndicate, bribes the captain to allow him to watch the stevedores working in the hold, where MacKeller is with the working gang.

When time for knocking off arrives, Johnson stops MacKeller and demands of him the papers. Upon refusal, Johnson acts on the delusion of men with much brawn and little backbone that might is right, and tries physical force. MacKeller floors him, and swiftly mounts to the deck. At the hatchway, Johnson clutches MacKeller, and after a terrific struggle pushes him into the hold, where he lands on a heap of canvas. The hatch is battened down, the deck cleared, and all is ready for the voyage. The ship has gone beyond the offing, before MacKeller's cries for help are heard. He is brought up on deck, lowered into the ship's yawl, and is taken ashore. He rushes to Lord Stranleigh's home, where he describes what he had gone through. Stranleigh listens with a practiced unconcern, that soon puts MacKeller at the boiling point. His exasperation simmers, then Stranleigh informs him he has a yacht that can do twenty-five knots an hour, whereas the "Rajah" can cover only ten, and then dryly asures MacKeller that they can stay on dry land for a full week, and then easily beat the "Rajah" to the objective point.

THE MAN WHO VANISHED (Dec. 26).—The vault of the Trinity Trust Company was to be blown that night by the Wykoff gang. Boyd has the tip and instructs Jimmie Coleman, a central office man, what to do. Broger's tailor shop, fronting on an alley, is the point of attack, and Boyd, in disguise, Coleman and detectives steal up to the place after dark. Boyd gains admission along with Coleman by saying he had a message from the boss, Wykoff. Broger is tied and gagged, and the two sleuth-find and open a trap door behind the counter, and descend to the basement. They feel their way along a tunnel. Just as they come to a lead-off, there is a terrific explosion and when the upheaval settles, they discover that the bottom of the Trinity Trust building's vault is blown out. Along the main tunnel come Wycoff and two of his gang. Boyd and Coleman dash from the lead-off, but the master criminal makes good his escape. The next day, Coleman asks Boyd how he had gotten a line on this attempt to rob the vault.

It seems that Boyd, knowing he was being watched by some gang, resorted to disguise. Noting a spy enter Broger's shop, Boyd, feigning a business errand, learns of the trap behind the counter. On meeting a friend, Sanderson, he is told a strange story. An acquaintance, Kramer, had asked Sanderson to put a tin box, containing negotiable bonds, in the vault over Sunday. In the box was a costly clock from Kramer's fiancee, and this decided Sanderson to put the box in the vault. Boyd went to Kramer's office in the Trinity building, and entered with a skeleton key. The office had been left for good, and in the rubbish Boyd came upon an old clock case from which the works had been taken. His guess about an infernal machine was correct. Coleman now understood how Boyd got "wise" to rob the vault.

ESSANAY.

THEIR CHEAP VACATION (Dec. 21).—The Newlyweds read in the newspaper of an ideal automobile trip which only costs $12. Mr. Newlywed decides to take a few days vacation and enjoy the outdoor air, not feeling that he can afford a more expensive vacation. They pack a camper's outfit on the car and start out. First a farmer demands that they pay $10 for ruining his grass with a fire. Next they are arested for speeding and fined $15. At last they find an ideal spot, but no more than get their tent set up when a farmer comes along and tells them to come across with $10 or get out. They give up the money. That night they are visited by a huge snake, and then comes the mosquito family. They try to smoke the pests out and set fire to the tent. They flee outside and find themselves in a rain storm, so are forced to retire to a farm house where the children have the mumps. After spending the night there they start for home. The car breaks down and the repair bill is $75. They wind up by both catching the mumps.

She is in the act of entering the home of her uncle with a skeleton key, when Thomas Rockwell, alias "Tommyrot," a young author, happens along and helps her. They are caught in the house, but make their escape after "Tommyrot" has knocked out her uncle. "Tommyrot" then takes Margery to his home, where after hearing her story he determines to get the papers. Hawkins, her uncle's butler, has followed them and that night Margery receives a note telling her that her uncle has reconsidered and for her to call at 8.30. She goes, but "Tommyrot" follows her, and when her uncle attacks her, the young author overpowers him. While the struggle is in progress, a man enters who proves to be her real uncle. The impostor is arrested while "Tommyrot" turns to Margery to call her his own.

sinkers and coffee. One night she panned him to a whisper for not showing up at one of her shin digs, so he promised to be on hand for the next one. Some time later Mrs. Clymer rallied the hens one afternoon for a musical. Hubby happened home early, so nothing would do but he must get gussied up and entertain the ladies. There was one young grass widow present who looked mighty good to hubby. His wife had told him to pay some attention to her "lady" friends, so he extended himself. Before sending the widow home he got her address and told her he kind o' wished he was single. Mrs. Clymer got his number and forbade him to ever show up at another one of her parties. Moral: oSlomon proved his wisdom by marrying all of his wife's friends, but the modern wise man passes them up.

SLIPPERY SLIM GETS SQUARE (Dec. 24).—When the handbills are distributed announcing that a dance is to be given at the town hall that evening, Slim loses no time in asking Sophie to accompany him. She accepts, so he hurries to the creek to take his bath. Meanwhile Mustang has invited Sophie and is refused. He strolls down to the creek and finds Slim's clothes. He hides them and feeling certain that Slim will be unable to find them, prepares to take Sophie to the dance. Slim manages to get home under cover of a gunny sack, and while Mustang is getting cleaned up, puts some powder on his clothes which has a smarting effect. Mustang goes to call for Sophie but is most uncomfortable. In the meantime Slim writes a note telling Sophie that Mustang has smallpox. Sophie sees how restless he is so throws him out. Slim then steps in and has things his own way.

After this episode he sends in his resignation, not having the nerve to serve as sheriff. The council calls on Broncho Billy, whe refuses to take the office. Shortly afterward the bad man tries to force his affections on Broncho's sweetheart. She threatens to tell Broncho of his act, and to prove to her that he has no fear of Broncho, the bad man that night attacks him while he sleeps, and after binding him, makes his escape. Next day Broncho asks to be made sheriff. He immediately starts after the bad man, and after a fierce struggle captures him. He then again resigns as sheriff.

ANY WOMAN'S CHOICE (Special—Two Parts -Dec. 25). The Woman has two great loves in her life—the Man and the Mutual Friend. The Man wins and they are married, but insist that the Mutual Friend share his lonely life with them in their beautiful home. In a year the Man's love is dead. He spends his time with the Other Woman, under a pretense of being kept away on business.

The Woman fights a losing battle for the love of her husband. He neglects her more and more. Bills pile up. In her loneliness the Woman plays bridge for diversion. She loses heavily and the Other Woman buys up her I. O. U's. The Mutual Friend discovers the tragedy and leaves the house to protect the Woman's honor. The Other Woman invites the Woman to a big bridge party, telling the Woman it is her chance to cancel her debt, but with the real intention of getting her further into her snare.

The Mutual Friend also is invited and refuses to attend. The Woman does not know what to do as the Other Woman has threatened to expose her dead if she does not attend. In desperation she goes to the Mutual Friend. He takes her to the apartment of the Other Woman, where he settles the gambling debt and denounces her. They return to the Woman's home together. The Other Woman calls up the husband and tells him they are on the way to his house. He meets them with a revolver. The Mutual Friend brings the man to a realization of his neglect which has driven his wife into temptation.

The Man breaks down and agrees to go away and leave them. But the Woman has grown to care for the Mutual Friend because of his faithfulness and kindness, yet she is still in love with her husband and is touched by his repentance. The two men agree to let her choose which shall remain. She stretches out her hands in agony to both of them, leaving open the question, which does she choose.

BIOGRAPH.

THE SHERIFF OF WILLOW GULCH (Dec. 14) Out of gratitude for his kindness to her father, the girl accepts the sheriff as her lover, though she loves another man. The men's rivalry for her hand is complicated by their struggle for political honors. When Rufus Warren discovers that there is a reason why he must never marry, and learns the truth about the girl's regard for him, he makes a sacrifice such as only the great-minded man can make. Even after he goes out of her life his influence remains to bring good to her lover.

A SCRAP OF PAPER (Special—Two Parts—Dec. 15).—An innocent little love note, written by Louise de Merival before her marriage, is the pivot about which this most vivacious comedy turns. Prosper and Anatole, cousins, love the daughters of Madame de Merival; but mamma has other plans. She spirits the girls off to Paris, where Louise soon forgets Prosper and marries a baron. But Mathilda is true to Anatole. Suzanne, the girl's cousin, conspires with Louise to get back the note from Prosper. She searches his rooms and, when the baron follows Louise thither, she saves her cousin by trumping up an old love affair with Prosper, as a result of which the baron calls Prosper a scoundrel and tells him he must marry Suzanne on pain of death. Anatole and Mathilde are unwittingly drawn into the whirlpool of circumstances which revolves about the scrap of paper.

RED DYE (Dec. 17).—Crooks upstairs, and above the crooks an actress who spills a tub of scarlet dye, help to enliven George's call on his best girl. The dye seeps through the floors, staining everything it tuoches. "Blood!" exclaim the crooks, with guilty consciences, and flee. "Blood!" cries Myrtle, and swoons. Enter the police—complications explanations laughter.

A NATURAL MISTAKE (Dec. 17). What is a husband to think when he finds a half-smoked cigarette on the table, and later a burning epistle from his wife to another man? Suspicion—a plan to catch her in her lover's arms—a sudden return to find her entertaining not one man, but two. Then a chase over the roofs, and revenge upon the unhappy amateur actors who were rehearsing in hubby's home.

HIS PRIOR CLAIM (Dec. 18).—Because his scapegrace brother has married a frivolous girl, William Dearborn turns his face against them. In desperation Harry determines to steal, and is fatally wounded by a watchman. Molly, dying of exhaustion, leaves their baby alone in the world; but her friend Mabel, Dearborn's trusted employee, adopts the child. Then one day Dearborn learns that he has a niece, and is captivated by her. He urges his prior claim to the child, but little Edith was "Mamma Mabel" to go wherever she goes.

THE BOND SINISTER)Dec. 19).—Trapped on an open drawbridge, the fleeing crooks resist arrest, and one of their shots strikes down their former associate, Miller, who has tried to reform. Bending over him as he dies is the girl for whose sake he has risked all—the daughter of the rich jeweler, whose consignment the crooks have contrived to steal, although Miller has done his best to foil them. A powerful example of the way in which a man's past can rise up to mock him, and of the courage with which a brave soul may atone for wrong-doing.

ON THE HEIGHTS (Dec. 22).—"Down to Gehenna or up to the throne, he travels the fastest who travels alone." But Irma Eberhard did not travel alone. With her on the barren road she trod were a ghostly company—the memory of her mother on which she swore to resist the temptations of court life, the bleeding heart of her lover. And so she never reached the heights. But neither was she alone when the great shame touched her, and in agony of soul she came close to the gates of hell. For even here the love of a strong man went before her.

Life savers are rushed from San Francisco in a motor truck and begin a long fight to save the wreck victims. The Hearst-Selig operator was on the ground at daylight and made a series of remarkable pictures of the wreck, showing the victims struggling in the water, the signal fires along the beach, the wreckage driven up by the pounding surf and life savers taking the last two survivors off a bit of wreckage to which they had clung after the vessel was broken to pieces.

THE RIVAL STAGE LINES (Dec. 1).—Harding Martin and David Patrick are both desperately in love with Elsie Johnson. Each tries to gain some advantage over his rival. Pretty Elsie coquettishly enjoys their rivalry and fosters it. Both young men decide to go west, and they buy rival stage lines. Their rivalry continues in business. An express carrying contract is to be awarded and Chalmers Brown, the local manager for the express company, is instructed to give the contract to the stage concern that makes the quickest trip to the neighboring town. Elsie appears on the scene and promises to marry the winner.

Martin and Patrick, the rival stage managers, each plan to hold up the other fellow's stage and defeat him. A band of Indians holds up one stage, while a band of cowboys holds up the other. There is a great mix-up. The rivals quarrel, and while they argue Chalmers Brown takes the two stages to the winning point, wins Elsie and announces that the express company will install their own stage line.

THE LION HUNTER (Dec. 2).—Hans Fredericka, a South African Boer, lives in a comfortable house with his daughter, Wilhelmina, a pretty and modest maiden. She is in love with Peter Grosse, a young Boer who lives on an adjoining plantation. Peter, with a party of gay friends, comes to visit Wilhelmina and her father.

A letter is received from Lawrence Stanley, a young English hunter, who has visited them before stating that he will arrive shortly with a hunting party. Wilhelmina is distracted from her love for Peter by the handsome young Englishman, and he gives her as a keepsake a talisman, which she hangs about her neck with a ribbon. Peter becomes jealous and after Lawrence has started for the interior with his hunting party engages a tribe of hostile blacks to pursue and make way with the Englishman.

Wilhelmina endeavors to frustrate the plot, gets lost in the jungle and after many privations, is rescued through the fact that a runaway tame elephant found the talisman which she had dropped. The elephant takes the bauble to the camp, whereupon Stanley hastens to the rescue and on the way saves Peter from a prowling lion. All jealousy is then forgiven and forgotten.

WHICH HAM IS SCHNAPPSMEIER'S? (Dec. 4).—There is not much individuality to a ham, therefore, when a man has lost a ham and sees another that looks like it, he cannot be blamed for thinking it to be his own property. It is a picture that will make even the most staid laugh.

LOVE'S ACID TEST (Dec. 4).—The subject tells the story of a love-sick drug clerk who puts poison in a prescription made up for a sick and penniless man. A chapter of accidents prevents him from taking the medicine, whereupon his condition both financially and physically is improved immediately.

HER SISTER (Dec. 5).—Molly and Kate Adams, two pretty sisters, live at home with their invalid mother, and are employed in a department store. Brooks, a department manager in the store, is in love with Molly, while Dr. Holt, the family physician, who is treating the invalid mother, is attracted by Kate.

Kulp, one of the floorwalkers in the store, becomes smitten with the charms of Molly, but his intentions are dishonorable. He is a capable employee in the store, but has spells caused by a weakness of the heart. Molly is threatened with discharge and Kulp prevails upon her fears sufficiently to persuade her to compromise herself with him. He buys a gold bracelet for Molly, which she wears home. Her engagement with Kulp has kept her out until an unseemly hour, which has worried Kate, who charges her with the worst. Kate is determined to wreak vengeance upon the perfidious Kulp and concealing a poisoned dagger in her bosom, she goes to his home. Kulp, in his sub-normal physical condition has been killed by the sting of a wasp, the poison having entered his jugular vein. Then all is forgiven and the two young couples become united in wedlock.

SAVED BY A WATCH (Dec. 8).—Alice has just graduated from her college and is packing to return home. Among her treasures is a photograph of a cowboy that she has kept for some time. Heffron, a bold, brazen young man, who earns his living by gambling, meets Alice when she arrives at the Western village and annoys her with his intentions. Tom, who happens to be the cowboy whose photograph she has so carefully preserved, appears upon the scene in time to save Alice from further annoyance from Heffron.

Tom owns half interest in the stage line, and he is informed by the station agent that a large shipment of gold is to be sent over the stage line the following day. Heffron learns of this and accompanied by two outlaws, holds up the stage. Tom rides beside the stage containing the gold shipment, and when the outlaws attack the stage, he succeeds in driving them off. A watch, containing Alice's portrait, is shattered by a bullet which otherwise would have pierced his heart. Of course he wins Alice.

THE ABYSS (Dec. 9).—Guy Gordon and Velma Irving have become man and wife without the performance of a ceremony by church or state. They are infatuated with each other and Guy's father tries to separate them. His efforts are unavailing and Guy leaves home to occupy apartments with his inamorata.

A year later Guy's father visits the apartment and finds conditions of dissipation and immorality which cause him to persuade Guy that he should endeavor to do better. Velma overhears the conversation and persuades Guy to go with her into the wilderness where they can fight the curse of liquor which controls them both. Guy falls in love with a beautiful girl who is modest, beautiful and sincere. He wants to leave Velma, but she clings to him. He leaves the cabin and she follows. Velma falls over a cliff and Guy endeavors to rescue her with a rope. But her weight pulls him over the cliff also and thus they die as they have lived—in immorality together.

Trixy has a friend, Daisy Bell, who is the proprietor of a manicuring parlor. Oliver and Trixy are in despair, until one day the Colonel, who is a dapper, well preserved gentleman, espies Trixy and Daisy, and receiving sufficient encouragement because the girls have identified him, he follows them to the manicuring parlor. The Colonel is so well treated that he revisits the parlor, and one day the three plotters, Oliver, Trixy and Daisy, determine to trap the old gentleman. Oliver disguises himself as a French hair-dresser, while Trixy poses as a manicurist. The Colonel is afforded a most exquisite toilet, after which he is handed a bill for $2,000. THE SOUL MATE (Dec. 12).—Sally Brent, a pretty laundry girl, believes in palmistry and is told by a charlatan that the man who affects purple as his color, is her affinity and soul mate. She is loved by Dan Maguire, driver of the laundry wagon, but he is very fond of red, which causes Sally much grief as she thinks a lot of Dan. One day she does up a bundle of shirts in which the color purple predominates. She writes a message on one of the cuffs, calling the owner her "soul mate."

The shirts belong to Gordon West, a young clubman. One of his acquaintances discovers the note written on the cuff, and after locating Sally, pretends to be her "soul mate" and invites her to meet him in the park. Sally is amazed and angry when she discovers that her admirer has dishonorable intentions. In the next batch of laundry she hides a note, demanding that West cease his attentions to her. West finds the note, discovers the cad who has impersonated him, punishes him severely and then goes to the laundry and gives Sally a lecture on "soul mates." Sensible Sally thereupon presents Dan with a flaming red necktie.

Horace Burke, son of a wealthy lumberman, becomes a passenger on the vessel and is at once attracted by the beauty of the Captain's daughter. Life on board ship furnishes opportunities for love making, so that Burke persuades Jo to renounce her promise to wed Jim and agree to become his wife. Poor Jim is disconsolate and realizes that his hopes of happiness are about to be wrecked.

Captain Duggen has an attack of heart failure and dies suddenly. At the same time a cry of fire is raised by the sailors. Jim's first thought after discovering that the vessel is lost, is for the safety of his sweetheart, Jo, but she looks to Burke for protection, only to discover to her great horror that he is an abject coward and selfishly tries to save himself without a thought for her danger. She is forced into a boat, but refuses to leave her father's body. She swims back to the ship, followed by Jim, who gives a hasty burial to the dead and then saves his sweetheart. Nothing can part them thereafter.

Barlow, circus man, engages Annette to paint life pictures of certain ferocious tigers. Just at this time, Gilbert announces that he must start for Paris at once. Annette begins painting the tigers at the country home of Barlow, presided over by the latter's maiden sister. The tigers are in an improvised cage connected with the living-room. For two months Annette resists the importunities of Barlow, but finally becoming piqued at the apparent discourtesy of Gilbert, she accepts Barlow's attentions. Annette learns to train the tigers and work them in their cage. Gilbert returns from Paris and has a desperate fight with Barlow. Gilbert is forced into the tigers' cage to be torn by their relentless claws. Annette comes to the rescue, controls the tigers; the duplicity of Barlow is discovered with the help of a tiger and the lovers are reunited.

Bob is a manly appearing fellow, and when he demands Grace's hand, the Rev. Travers signifies approval, but demands that Bob shall answer one question in private. Bob replies to the question, "Is there another woman in your life who has any claim upon you?" that there is not, but Bob lies.

Back in the city pretty Thais occupies an apartment, for the maintenance of which Bob provides the money. He tells Thais of his approaching wedding and in reply to her vehement protestations, declares that their agree-

By "MICA"

In making my "All-American" selection, I have tried to be impartial as to sectional prejudice. I have scoured both East and West for my material and have picked the best for their respective positions. The public in general will admit that the two colleges that have the best teams are "Comedy" and "Drama" and I, therefore, had to select several of the best from each of these colleges. Although "Scientific & Educational" college is small, I could not leave "Nolege" out. The same applies to "Kriterion Star Subject" of "Kriterion" college as I will show you in the following:—

The Line

In choosing my ends, I could not overlook "Monarch" and "Navajo." Their ability to get right down the field and nail their people assured them of their places.

The tackles are the "Santa Barbara" brothers whose head work in figuring out what the opposition was doing and then stopping the play before it was started has proven them to be peers in their respective positions.

For my guards, I also chose brothers in the "Alhambras." Their steadfastness and firmness in resisting attacks place them as bulwarks.

An "All-American" team needs in a centre position one who blossoms forth at all times. "Thistle" is this very man.

The Backfield

In a Captain, the team needs a general and I believe I have made no mistake in choosing "Nolege" who has the scientific rudiments, together with three seasons of educational work in the game.

For perfection in circling the ends, either "Trump" or "Paragon" are fast, but this is not their best asset. When this team would have to make large gains, the manager would be able to count on his "Trump" or "Paragon" to receive the forward pass from my full back, "Punch," to make the required gain. For strength in bucking the line, "Punch" sets the pace. He sure hits it with a vim that is unequaled by any other.

For my reserve, I choose "Kriterion Star Subject." I put him in this position because my other men are strong enough to hold any opposition during the week, and when the big games come along at the end of each week this man could certainly be counted on to win the feature.

Management

"Mica Film Corporation," by its organization and its giant strides, is too well known in the field to select any other and is perfectly capable of handling this sterling line of material.

Head Coach

Who other than B. E. Clements could I choose? He has proven by his past performances each year to be in a class by himself.

Assistant Coaches

I choose "Our Exchanges" to assist my head coach. Their years of high standing in the game place them on my staff without doubt. They are known and recognized to be the ones that instill respect into all who come in contact with them.

I also wish to mention "Exhibitors" of "Theatre" college who have shown great promise this season, and trust I may get in more personal touch with them so as to get a better line on them. I predict you will see them on my selection next season.

All of my "All-American" selections and my "Honorable Mention" have passed the stage of inexperience by their previous work in the last five years and are without a doubt able to cope with this—ment has always contemplated such a result and that his lawyer will pay her $2,000 in full satisfaction of all claims. The wedding day approaches and Thais determines to create a scene at the wedding. While motoring to the church, she is fatally injured. She writes a letter of confession to Grace, the letter to be delivered on the first anniversary of her marriage to Bob. Then when the day comes to deliver the letter, the spirit of Thais appears, and influences the messenger, who tears up the letter. The spirit of Thais then blesses those assembled at the anniversary wedding.

THE CHAMPION BEAR SLAYER (Dec. 26). —Edith, the daughter, returns home from a western trip, bringing with her a very diminutive cub bear. Father at the club, has created a reputation as a genuine Ananias, because he continues to tell with added exaggerations a wonderful story of his fearless fight with several bears, which, however, exist only in his imagination. Father comes home from the club appearing slightly intoxicated.

The bear cub has escaped from his collar, and being hungry, approaches father in the dark. Father runs with the bear cub in pursuit. From one room to another, they rush, and each time the imagination of father causes the bear to grow in size exactly as the bears did in his imaginary story, which he told at the club.—In the picture, various sizes of bears are substituted; in fact, a whole band of them, so that father's fears are not wholly groundless.—After many mishaps, during which father slides down a chute with the bear after him, he jumps through a panel door into the room of an old maid, with the bear in full chase until he scrambles through a window out on the fire-escape. Then the police are called, and father collapses when he sees the real size of the bear.

THE MYSTERY OF THE SEVEN CHESTS (Special Two Parts—Dec. 7).—Jack Lawless, a mysterious individual with a past life of criminality, places in storage seven chests, the contents of which he considers of great value, and yet does not divulge them to the warehouse keeper. Immediately after leaving the warehouse, Lawless is run down by an automobile and is taken to the hospital, where he is pronounced fatally injured. Realizing that he is dying, he writes a letter to his sister, Cleo, giving her the name and location of the warehouse so that she can obtain possession of the chests. The letter is given to a nurse to mail, but it is accidentally knocked behind a desk. Fifteen years later, the letter is found and mailed to Cleo, sister of Lawless.

Cleo receives the letter and reads it in a public place. Rose, the daughter of a convict, serving a life term for murder, looks over Cleo's shoulder and reads the contents of the letter. Rose believes that Cleo's brother, Lawless, is guilty of the murder for which her father is imprisoned, and believes that the murderer's confession is concealed in one of the chests. Cleo and her husband start at once for the city where the chests have been stored.

In the meantime the chests have been sold for storage charges and have been bought by John Belmont, a man-about-town, who orders then taken aboard the yacht "Dawn."

Cleo questions the warehouse manager about the chests. He explains that they have been sold for storage and points out to her the figure of John Belmont disappearing down the street. She hastens after him and endeavors to secure the chests from him, becoming excited and angry and finally making an offer of $5,000 for them. He is obdurate and Cleo goes away angry, informing her husband that this man has bought the chests and ordered them taken on board his yacht, "Dawn."

Rose arrives shortly after the departure of Cleo and her husband. The puzzled warehouse manager repeats the information already imparted to Cleo. Rose hastens to the wharf, but arrives in time only to witness the departure in the distance of the yacht

The yacht arrives safe at the country home of John Belmont, where the chests are taken ashore and places in the library.

Cleo and her husband, having made unsuccessful attempts to secure possession of the chests, first from the storage warehouse manager and afterwards from honest Captain Moon, commander of the yacht "Dawn," determine to follow the quest. The husband makes friends with a band of harbor pirates, who accept from him an advance payment with the agreement that they shall receive more money after they shall have accomplished the stealing of the chests. The harbor pirates embark on board another yacht under the leadership of Cleo's husband.

In the meantime, Rose, eager to discover the contents of the mysterious chests, engages an automobile, in which she drives down the Lake Shore in the direction of John Belmont's home only to be disconcerted by the statement of the chauffeur that the rest of the way is too rough for a motor car. Still there are six miles to go. Rose leaves the automobile and determines to make the rest of the way on foot. A heavy storm comes up and the poor girl is thoroughly drenched when she sees the lights of John Belmont's bungalow gleaming in the distance. Rose staggers up to the house and is admitted by the servants. In her exhausted condition, she can hardly speak, yet she informs them of the necessity for seeing John Belmont immediately. Belmont hears her story and comforts her by saying that the chests shall be turned over to her and that in the morning they will discover the mysterious contents.

Cleo's husband and his band of harbor pirates approach the house. They have arrived too late to prevent the landing of the chests. They reconnoiter and locate the chests in the library. In the early gray dawn, they boldly force an entrance through the library window and enter the house.

John Belmont hears noises and slips quietly into the library, where he quickly perceives the open window. The pirates seize him and bind and gag him. Then they carry the chests away.

Rose arises early and hears a sound in the library. Hurrying in, she finds John Belmont bound and helpless on the floor. She quickly releases him and he tells of the successful raid of the harbor pirates. The household is quickly awakened and John Belmont, followed by Rose, hastens to the landing, where the crew of the yacht "Dawn" are aroused and informed of the raid made by the pirates. Lines are cast off and the yacht starts in pursuit.

A tiny smudge of smoke on the horizon indicates to Captain Moon the whereabouts of the rapidly disappearing pirate craft. Soon the distance has been so shortened that fire-arms can be used. Cleo's husband is armed with a rifle, while his fellow pirates possess revolvers. They begin shooting at the pursuing vessel, but finding that bullets will not stop the approach of the "Dawn" they run close to shore, lower a boat and, placing the chests in the smaller craft, make a dash for the shore, where they take position behind the rocks and use the chests for breast-works. The crew of the "Dawn" follows and after a brisk exchange of shots Cleo's husband is killed and the harbor pirates surrender.

The seven mysterious chests are taken back to the bungalow, where John Belmont, aided by the servants, smashes the locks and opens them one after another. Rose searches feverishly through the contents for the object of her quest and finally discovers it in the last and smallest chest. It is a confession of Lawless that he committed the murder for which Rose's father is serving a life term in the penitentiary. John Belmont demands his reward and Rose modestly and sweetly grants him her hand.

THE LURE O' THE WINDIGO (Special - Two Parts—Dec. 14).—Old Hugo Le Clerq, a wilderness trapper, has two offspring whom he loves dearly. Louis is a lumberman and works in the camps getting out timber, while Annette, his daughter, attends to the household duties and creates in that lonely wilderness a home. She has long been beloved by Jacques Le Bere, an honest fellow, who works in the lumber camps with Louis. One day Gerard McChesney, a Sergeant of the Northwest Mounted Police, rides up to the cabin, where he is hospitably greeted and invited to remain as a guest. McChesney boldly courts Annette and places a ring on her finger, and their engagement is announced. Louis and Jacques leave home for a distant lumber camp, where they are to remain for several months.

McChesney remains a visitor after the departure of the two young men, but finds it necessary to return to his command to resume his duties. He promises Annette that he will return shortly and make her his bride. In view of what has passed between them Annette is worried and restless as the days go by, for there is a fear in her heart that cannot be dispelled until the priest shall speak the words that shall bind McChesney and herself together as man and wife.

During the happy days that passed while her lover was her companion, Kiawa, a Cree Indian who visited the cabin frequently, formed a liking for their companionship. He told them Indian legends, among which was that of the "Windigo, the spirit of the wind" that talked to the children of earth in a voice which sounded like the wind sighing through the tree tops. On blustery days he listened for the "voice" which Annette acknowledged she could hear distinctly also, but bluff McChesney scorned such thoughts and laughed in derision at the superstition.

One day while McChesney was riding his rounds on patrol duty, he came upon Kiawa illicitly setting a fox trap. This not being the season permissible for catching fur-bearing animals the policeman, who was under the influence of liquor, seized the unfortunate Indian and beat him without mercy as a lesson to "not do it again." Kiawa has a pretty squaw named Minna whose attractiveness has not escaped the eye of the bold policeman. Hearing the cries of her husband, she hastens to his assistance, whereupon the wrath of McChesney is diverted. He seizes her in a rough embrace and Kiawa realizes her peril. He attacks McChesney in an effort to release his squaw, but in the struggle he is readily worsted and McChesney wounds him in the leg. The half-drunken policeman then compels the Indian woman to enter her own cabin with him, where he bars the door.

After spending several hours in the cabin, McChesney mounts his horse and continues his patrol. The young squaw hastens to the relief of her husband, Kiawa. The heart of the Indian is filled with revenge. Minna does not need to tell him the painful truth; neither does she deny it. It is useless; Kiawa refusing to believe that the fault is not hers, scorns and repulses the injured girl.

Annette sends a tear-bespattered letter to McChesney, begging him to return at once and marry her, but he ignores her appeal, and as his duties call him elsewhere he departs from that vicinity without sending the grieving and wronged girl a word. McChesney goes to the lumber camp followed by Kiawa. McChesney has ample time for dissipation and Kiawa finds him indulging in orgies with the habitues of the saloons and dance halls clustered in the small settlement. He waits his opportunity, and while McChesney is sitting at a table playing cards with a lot of dissolute characters, Kiawa sends a bullet against his temple from a powerful sling-shot. Whereupon McChesney falls over aparently dead.

Kiawa thinks he has killed his enemy and returns to his cabin. He visits the home of Le Clerq and learns that poor Annette and her unwelcome baby have been turned awa from the door of her father's cabin. In his kindness of heart, Kiawa finds shelter and food for the poor girl, until one day he learns that McChesney has not died from his wound, but has recovered. The crafty Indian believes that his revenge can best be consummated by taking the dishonored girl and her infant to McChesney and there confront him with the proof of his dishonorable act.

Annette refuses to accompany Kiawa until he calls her distracted mind to the "voice of the Windigo," which he interprets into a message that she shall go with him. They find McChesney in a dance hall surrounded by painted women and in the crowd of men standing about are Louis and Jacques, who have dropped in our of curiosity. The entrance of the Indian and the half-crazed girl with her baby jars the entire assemblage. McChesney notes the appearance of the girl he has wronged and attempts to leave the place, but Louis realizes the situation at a glance. He now discovers the treachery of his dishonorable friend. Kiawa hurriedly explains the situation, whereupon Louis demands that McChesney shall make amends. A missionary, engaged in rescue work, appears upon the scene at this opportune moment, and Louis forces the abject and cowardly McChesney to marry Annette at once.

The simple ceremony concluded, Louis turns firecely upon McChesney and demands that he shall give satisfaction to the brother of the sister whom he has wronged. The crowd form a space. McChesney's arms are reluctantly given up and the two engage in a fierce and terrific struggle. But right is on the side of the brave young brother, while the boldness and brazened bullying of McChesney have been replaced by a cowardly fear. The spectators see that there can be only one end and that follows quickly. Louis forces McChesney to the floor with a violent blow on the face. Then he kneels upon the body, and clutching at the hairy throat of his enemy, presses with knotted fingers upon the wind-pipe until the fatal end.

Annette's reason has been restored by the excitement and fury of the conflict, so that when the forgiving Jacques, to whom Annette has always remained a sweetheart in spirit, takes her tenderly in his arms, she realizes that his is the one true heart to make her happy for life.

THE SIEGE OF LIEGE. (Dec. 31.) Harry Palmer, the well known war correspondent and newspaper cartoonist, is sent posthaste to Belgium to make a series of sketches of the Seige of Liege. With his assistant he takes ship for Rotterdam, and is there transferred to a small launch which, manned by Belgium peasants, runs up the River Scheldt to Antwerp. There he succeeds in purchasing an airship from the military authorities and flies to the scene of action. This flight is replete with comic, as well as thrilling situations. Bombs burst in the air close to the machine—the cargo is thrown over board and funny things happen on the ground along the route until the aeroplane finally lands safely on a hilltop overlooking the battlefield and half ruined fortress of Liege.

There Mr. Palmer sets up his easel and starts to sketch, but the wear and excitement of the journey have tired him out and he falls asleep at his work. A weird dream occurs to him, and the fanciful and ludicrous things he sees are all set forth in the screamingly funny cartoon picture which follows. The artist is finally awakened by a vigorous 'slap which he administers to a mosquito which is seen fattening upon his head.

THE BELOVED ADVENTURER SERIES NO. 15.—IN PORT O'DREAMS (Dec. 21).—Lord Cecil and Lady Betty have had a year of perfect peace and happiness since the strange and thrilling experiences which came so near costing them their love and later their lives, and during which fate brought to tragic ends the two enemies to their contentment and prosperity, the Nevada gambler Carson and the daring adventuress Countess Lurovitch. All the ten thousand broad acres originally embraced by the Croftlaigh estate have been recovered from those to whom several generations of the Lords Cecil had been forced by poverty to sell. Betty is, on her own account perfectly content in the secluded life which they live, and has no social ambitions, but she fears that Lord Cecil will in time weary of the life of a country gentleman and be shamed when he realizes that high society is ignoring their existence.

For the sake of the dignity of her husband's hereditary rank she regrets that she cannot command the deference given only to those of noble blood, and without which real social standing is impossible so long as society is dominated by the despotic and wealthy old aristocrat, the Duchess of Drex. The Duchess of Drex, though a rather terrible old lady to the eyes of the world, is at heart lonely and sad, a childless widow.

Twenty years before her only daughter, Elizabeth, rejecting the noble marriage arranged for by the ambitious Duchess, had put love for Robert Lee, the son of a country squire, above all else, and as his wife had gone with him to seek fortune, in far lands, passing out of the life and knowledge of her stern mother. As she grows old the Duchess' heart softens, and she dispatches a trusted agent to seek for the lost daughter. The search for this daughter ends in the cemetery of a Western mining camp, but the agent returns to England with word that the Duchess is the grandmother of Betty, Lady Cecil. The old lady hastens to proffer to this child of her daughter the love which she has so long denied. As heiress to the enormous fortune of the Duchess of Drex and of her patrician blood, Betty's social status is fixed, but her pleasure in this is nothing beside a greater pride and joy which soon comes to her, when, in accordance with ancient custom, she stands beside Lord Cecil as he presents to the assembled tenants of Croftlaigh one who in

THE JEWEL OF ALLAH (Dec. 20).—Two Hindoo slaves come upon a peculiar jewel of wondrous brilliancy. On their way with it to the Sultan, a ray of light from the gem brings back the sight of a blind beggar. The jewel contains some property of radium but the ignorant Hindoo slaves regard it with awe as, possessing some divine power. With the beggar following them they present the jewel to the Sultan and explain the miracle. The ruler decides to have it set and commissions his prime minister, body guard, to take it to the United States for this purpose.

Arriving in New York, the wonderful stone is left in the care of Mr. Manderson, the famous jewelry. That evening the wealthy stone setter is presented with a bust of himself made by his blind daughter, Ellen. Her affliction has been the sorrow of his otherwise happy life. That same evening he reads a newspaper notice of the jewel which has been left with him and realizes this wonderful stone is his. Proceeding to his store, he robs his own safe but, meanwhile, grouped around a table, the prime minister and his followers are looking into the depth of a crystal ball and they see the robbing of the sacred jewel. Hastening at once to the jeweler's they follow Manderson and watch him as he enters the library of his home. One of the men attempt to raise the window sash and enter, and thinking it a thief, Manderson sticks the stone in the eye cavity in the bust which his daughter had presented him. The Hindoos enter and there is a fierce struggle which arouses Ellen, who comes into the library . In the struggle the electric lamp is overturned and the room is in total darkness. The girl's eyes come in contact with the stone and the mystic rays coming in touch with her vision restores her sight. Meanwhile the Hindoos find the jewel and, while the crystal peerer prostrates himself before it, the father of Ellen is explaining the story of the Prime Minister, and the jewel of Allah is again left in care of Manderson to be set and cut.

LIZZIE'S FORTUNE (Dec. 10).—The widow, Lizzie Prune, a boarding house keeper, has three lazy boarders, who, though short on money, are long on the eats, never failing to appear at meal time. Lizzie is in love with Arthur, the handsome boarder, who repulses her advances at every turn, she being despised by all three of the boarders, who merely tolerate her on account of the easy living gained at her house. After grumbling about the dinner, the three boarders seek a comfortable spot in the garden, where they may pass the time until the next meal, leaving Lizzie to wash the dishes, chop wood, scrub, etc. While strolling in the garden, Arthur discovers a little boy playing with a torn letter, which is addressed to Lizzie Prune, stating that she has fallen heir to $50,000. Upon reading this part of the note, Arthur dishes off to where Lizzie is washing dishes and surprises her by making violent love and insists upon washing the dishes for her.

Meantime Gus and Max, the other boarders, see the note, which causes rivalry between all three of them; they chop wood, sweep floors, each trying to outdo the other, and win the widow. After a fight all three propose. Arthur is Lizzie's choice and they are married, much to the disgust of the other rivals. After the ceremony the newlyweds take a stroll in the garden, where they meet the child with the torn letter. Arthur's dream of wealth vanishes, when they match the pieces of letter together and find it reads that Lizzie's uncle left her $50,000, but owing to the uncle marrying since the will, the money would all revert to his widow. Arthur, upon learning this ,makes one grand dash to escape, but his newly-made wife will not let him get away so easy. The chase leads to the river, where Arthur, seeing no escape, jumps overboard followed by his wife, who captures him in the water and plants an affectionate kiss upon his brow.

HOW FATHER WON OUT (Dec. 16).—Ernie and Eddie are room-mates. They both are very fond of Bettie, a pretty waitress. Ernie makes better headway than Eddie, and Eddie gets rather sore and resolves to get revenge. He sends a telegram to Ernie's father, telling him Ernie is going to the bad. Father has just dismissed his housekeeper and gets the telegram. The only thing to do is to leave at once. He stops on the way to get some food and happens to run into Bettie's lunch room. Ernie is there at the time and hides in the kitchen. Eddie comes in and, finding the old man paying much attention to the waitress, bawls him out. Bettie tells Eddie to beat it. He does. Father leaves and goes to Ernie's boarding house. Eddie sees him coming and hides. Ernie tells Bettie that was his father and for her to kid him along. Ernie goes home and introduces Eddie and his father. Father puts a ban on Ernie, telling him he must stay in every night. Father has taken a liking to the neat waitress and finally wins her hand. Ernie sneaks out to call on the girl; Eddie, too, is going to make a call. They find her gone from the restaurant and follow the direction toward her house. Both arrive at the same time ,only to see Father and Bettie come out as man and wife.

HIS DOCTOR'S ORDERS (Dec. 19).—Henry is dispatched to bring his wife's Mother home from the station. On the way he meets his old pal and college chum, Doc. Summers. Against his own good judgment Henry takes the time to go into a saloon to have one, and just one, "for old time sake." Later, when Henry discovers that Mother, has it in for him he requisitioned Doc, his pal, to help him out of the mess. This was easily worked and the pair started on a supposed ocean voyage, that Henry might recover a seemingly imparied health. Wife never loubted her hubby an instant, believing him to be a man of veracity. His absence caused her terrible pining, which wore on her own health to an extent that alarmed her mother. Mother then took things in her own hands and, determining to brighten her daughter up with a few weeks at the beaches, bustled her off.

Then came the awful newspaper reports about the supposed sinking in midocean of the very steamer Henry and Doc had supposedly sailed on. Wife goes into mourning, facing stolidly her unhappy lot. But here at the beaches are the pair enjoying life to its extreme. They accidentally run across their grief-stricken folks. They then learn that they are supposed to be lost at sea and, horrified at their position, they decided to keep their presence a mighty secret.

That they may make their existence known in a quite logecal way they dig up a row boat to look like one of the lost steamer's lifeboats and, rowing out from shore, they make up like lost and famished passengers from the shipwrecked steamer. They are rescued and brought ashore, where they are feted and hailed as heroes. Later comes the message from the steamship company denying the newspaper reports as false, and reporting the arrival of the ship all safe in port. Henry and Doc then find themselves in a most undignified position.

THE BARON'S BEAR ESCAPE (Dec. 20).—The Baron Wilhelm von Hasenpfeffer, a fat old coward, is anxious to show himself the gamest old sport in the country to the girl of his desire. He is favored by the girl's father, who, impressed with his wealth and position, uses a cane to drive off Wallace, a youthful and favored suitor. Nursing his sore feelings and limbs, young Wallace procures a bear skin, and, hiding on the back of the wagon which carries the Baron's hunting party to the mountains, gets into the skin in time to play bear for the ardent hunter.

Driven by terror, the Baron falls over a precipice. Thoroughly frightened by the consequences of his joke, Wallace calls to the Baron, now hanging to the limb of a tree half way down the precipice, that he will bring aid. Still in the bear skin, he rushes for help, and only the drunkenness of the first man he meets saves him from meeting the fate of the bear whose part he plays. Coming to the call station of the mounted police, he turns in a call that starts the force out on the gallop. Discarding the bear's head, he rushes back to the family, awaiting the return of the hunter. They, too, start to the rescue. Fearing he has not sufficient help to meet requirements, he calls upon the storekeepers at the crossroad of the mountains, who start forth at high speed to lend their aid.

The family arriving first, get a rope down to the struggling Baron, but their combined strength is not enough to raise him, even the tree about which they wind the rope is giving way. The mounted police arrive and add further to the excitement by one of their number falling over the precipice. To stop his terrific slide, he grabs the unfortunate Baron, and both are precipitated to a mud hole at the base of the precipice. The different parties of rescuers arriving at full speed lose their foothold on the slippery mountain side, and one after the other join the Baron in the mud hole, who finds himself a cushion for each arrival.

CRYSTAL.

How to get even with hubby! She compels the butler to make love to her, arranging the time so that Huff will see it. Huff discovers them and becomes furious. He goes to Nellie and tells her of his plan. He will be making love to her when Mrs. Huff enters; Mrs. Huff is huffed for fair when she sees them; she goes for Nellie with both hands and Huff gets the worst of it. He holds up Arthur, who gets the village constable after the terrible desperado. Rags holds up the constable and has a lot of fun with him. Then Grace's papa returns suddenly and Rags also holds him up with the glass pistol; then he makes him change clothes with him. Arthur encounters papa who looks exactly like the tramp. Armed with a sword, Arthur makes a heroic capture. He takes papa to the town jail and chains him to the wall; then he goes for Grace and takes her to the jail to convince her that he is "right there" with the hero goods. One glance at the chained-up prisoner—one shriek—"My Papa," followed by a rapid release of father, who presents Arthur with one large, juicy kick. Exit Arthur, sore at both ends. The constable arrives on the scene and announces he has captured the real tramp, whereupon Arthur is thrown into the creek.

VICTOR.

For years he had not heard from him, but the sweetheart who had been left behind came every day to cheer and care for him. Finally, one Sunday morning, the wayward boy wandered back to the little village where he had been raised. Meeting his sweetheart by the roadway, she tells him of his father's loneliness and yearning for him and shamed him for his neglect. Reproaching him for the condition into which he had allowed himself to drift, she persuaded him to go to her father, who was the village minister, to see what might be done to win back his manhood. Her father, for the sake of the aged parent, promised to give the boy a chance through the strength of his sweetheart's love and guidance, he was presently able to throw aside his evil ways and when his father's 80th birthday came along the sweetheart brought father and son together in happy reunion, receiving for her reward the love of the reformed son and the blessings of the aged parent.

the landlady's pet poodle, which is her inseparable companion, out for a walk. Eddie, disguised as a bad man, arranges a fake hold up and robs the janitor of the poodle. Frightened half to death, the janitor rushes back to the boarding house, being preceded by Eddie, who secretes the dog in his room. Leaving him in charge of Victoria, he goes down stairs and hears the terrible story told by the janitor. Eddie tells them he knows where the bad man is and offers to recover the poodle. He leaves, gun in hand, and goes to the back yard. Victoria lets the poodle down from the upstairs window and Eddie fires a few shots from his revolver. He then rushes back to the house and restores the poodle to the landlady. After this incident he becomes a guest of honor at the boarding house and board bills are forgotten.

FRONTIER.

A CIRCLE OF GOLD (Dec. 5).—Edythe felt her dying father's wish must be fulfilled. She goes to the West, where, heavily veiled, she becomes the wife of Fred, the son of her father's old friend. During the ceremony Edythe notices that Fred is under the influence of liquor. While his cowboy friends are congratulating him she slips away, happy in the thought that her father's hope has been realized, but herself feeling that she never wants to see her husband again. She notices an antique wedding ring, which was Fred's mother's lying on the dresser.

Joe, the director of the Standard Motion Picture Company, seeks to make Edythe his leading lady. She refuses. During the filming of a scene the heavy man is suddenly taken ill. Nearby the director observes Fred, a ragged tramp. He persuades him to take the part. The scene is between a brutal husband, Fred, and the mistreated wife, Edythe. Fred's portrayal is excellent, and the director offers him a steady engagement. Edythe recognizes in the tramp her husband. Something about Edythe puzzles Fred.

A month passes. Fred has arisen to a better place in the company. Seated by Edythe one day, he has it on his lips to propose, but does not, knowing that he is a married man. A unique ring on her finger attracts his attention. He recognizes his own wedding ring. Edythe feels that after all, her father's last wish was not an unwise one.

HIS HIGHER AMBITION (Dec. 12).—Fred, an actor, broken down in health, has come to the West, where he has fallen in love with Edythe, a simple country girl, the daughter of the sheriff. She tells Fred his suit is hopeless, and that she feels she has been ordained for a great stage career. Fred knows that her singing ambition can never be realized, and furthermore she never will be contented until she has had her fling at the stage.

Her father, the sheriff, is trusted with a considerable sum of money for safekeeping by his friend, the ranchman. Edythe pleads to be sent to New York to begin her career, but her father tells her that finances can not permit of it. Edythe's birthday comes, and in her diary her father reads she is expecting that—for her birthday present—he will send her East. He recalls the money intrusted with him, and finally gives it to Edythe, telling her she can go.

But Fred, disguised as a theatrical manager, has formed a little scheme of his own. He gives Edythe a hearing, and then informs her he is willing to risk sending her to New York and supplies her with the necessary money. Edyth returns the ranchman's money to her father, and soon leaves. A month goes by, and Edythe returns. Her father informs her of Fred's great sacrifice, and she hurries to offer belated thanks, but she arrives too late, and Edythe bitterly realizes at what cost has been "Her Higher Ambition."

BEAUTY.

LIMPING TO HAPPINESS (Dec. 8).—May and John are in love. At a dance, however, the demon of jealousy creeps in between them, and a violent quarrel results in a parting which seems irremediable. May's little sister, however, and Dr. Loveren, the family physician, conspire to put each lover in a position in which the other is compelled to forget pride in offering consolation. Supposing that they are suffering from a mutual affliction ,they gravely meet on crutches, to exchange sympathy. When Nellie, however, appears with her sturdy little leg in a plaster cast, the lovers begin to scent a ruse. And soon a miracle of healing is performed—in which crutches are flung aside, and wounded hearts made whole.

RELIANCE.

A LUCKY DISAPPOINTMENT (Dec. 23).—Mr. Fairley, a rancher, strongly objects when he finds his daughter, May, and young Jack Holt making love. Threatening to shoot Jack, he orders him from the house. May, fearing for Jack's safety, hides her father's gun. Mr. Fairley goes to the bank to draw money to pay for stock. While he is away Jack returns and persuades May to elope with him that night. Mr. Fairley returns from the bank and is busy far into the night. May manages to slip out of the window when the time arrives. She meets Jack and they speed off in a waiting buggy. Two traveling tinkers, who had become aware that there was a lot of money in the house, make use of the ladder, which May used to get out of her window, to effect an entrance. The tinkers surprise Mr. Fairley just as he has replaced the money in the safe. They bind, gag and threaten to torture him unless he tells the combination.

Jack and May arrive at the parson's and discover the parson has gone out of town and won't be back till next day. They decide to postpone the ceremony and hurry home. Unaware of what is happening in Mr. Fairley's office, Jack advises May to go quietly up the ladder so that she won't disturb her father. When May gets to her room she hears some strange noise and goes down the stairs to investigate. As she enters the office, she is seized by the tinkers, who try to make her open the safe for them. She refuses until the tinkers threaten to torture her father with hot irons. Jack is about to ride off when he hears May scream. He runs up the ladder and then finds his way down stairs to the office. May is about to open the safe when Jack enters. Jack is no match for the two burly tinkers and they soon overpower him. May looks on with terror, then remembering where she hid her father's gun she gets it and orders the tinkers to hold up their hands. Then giving the gun to Jack, who covers the crooks, she releases her father and gives the alarm. The crooks are given into the custody of some ranch hands. Jack returns the gun to Mr. Fairley, and is about to embrace May, when Mr. Fairley covers him with the gun and reminds Jack that he must first ask his consent. Jack puts his hands up but Mr. Fairley's face softens as he pulls Jack's hand down and places it in that of May.

BOBBIE'S MEDAL (Dec. 25).—Bobbie, a poor "newsie," reads in a paper that a Prince and Princess of Italy are visiting the country on a mission of state, and longs to see a real princess. He sits down on a curbstone to eat his bit of bread for lunch, and later overhears a couple of Italians conspiring to blow up the prince and princess as they land from the steamer. Bobbie is captured by the conspirators, but manages to escape and follows the bomb thrower to the pier. Just as the Italian is about to throw the bomb Bobbie grabs his arm, and, taking the lighted bomb away from him, jumps off the dock with it, and puts it out thus saving the princes and princess' life. He is brought to their apartments by a policeman and the prince pins a medal of honor on Bobbie's breast, while the princess stretches out her arms, and tells Bobbie to kiss her. Bobbie reaches out his arms to her, and—wakes up on the curbstone with a policeman bending over him and Bobbie trying to kiss the policeman and fumbling for the medal that isn't there.

THE EXPOSURE (Two Parts—Dec. 26).—Helen and Joe are in love. He receives a letter from his uncle offering him a good position in his law office. He shows Helen the letter and she shows him one from the Standard, also a check for a short story. They have a quarrel over a slight thing and he leaves for his uncle's place.

Six years go by and Helen is now a very successful writer on a large daily. The managing editor sends for her and tells her she must go West to cover a large graft story and land the men for another paper. She leaves that night and reports to the other editor. He gives her a list of the aldermen whom they suspect and the name of the politician who is handling the graft money for the Asphant Paving Co.

Helen sees Phelan and he takes her out to dinner that evening. A man speaks to him. Phelan borrows Helen's pad to write a note. When she gets home she notices on the next page in her pad the impression from the hand of Phelan. She reports to the editor and she, with the help of a man, installs a dictograph and that night she sees and hears the graft money passed, but into the hands of Joe Walsh. She goes to her room dazed, but sees him the next day, when he shows her the money he took, also other money, but it was taken to expose the other councilmen.

They go at once to the editor, where the money and affidavit is deposited in the office safe and she starts to write the great story. That night the council chamber is crowded. Helen finishes, gets a machine, goes to the station, gets detective and starts for the council and arrives just in time to save Walsh from being arrested, after he accuses the other men. While Helen places all under arrest, the boys can be heard with the extras.

OUR MUTUAL GIRL (Chapter 48—Dec. 14).—After a morning devoted to shopping, Margaret and Aunt Abbie had decided to see "The Hawk," the latest play William Faversham had produced. A friend arranged for them to meet the famous actor-manager, who, in the face of a disastrous theatrical season, has had the courage to retain the best ideals and traditions of the stage. Mr. Faversham took from a shelf in his dressing-room a huge hawk. Its wings were outstretched as if to hold it for an instant above its prey, its head was bent forward in vicious intent, its talons curled in anticipation. Then the actor told Our Mutual Girl and her aunt a story.

John Gordon, a young business man of good family, happens to observe two men and a girl who have been stopped by a tire puncture in a New York street. The cold-faced older man and his nervous, irritable associate were hardly types to attract one; but the wan-faced girl, whose eyes held a wistful gleam, appealed strongly to Gordon.

A few days later Gordon ran into the girl again in the hall of an expensive apartment house. Her smile of welcome was pitifully wan, and he asked and obtained consent to walk down the street with her. Then she confided in him. After that he saw her many times—and always he learned more of her story. Mary Falconer's father and James Passroe were gamblers, and often they made her a decoy for them. He determined to stop it if he could. So one day he boldly called upon Mary at her home.

There hs was discovered by her father and Passroe—and for the girl's sake, and to put the two gamblers off the scent, he allowed himself to be drawn into a game of cards. He came again and again—until he could no longer afford to go on losing at such a pace. So, seizing upon the first evidence of crooked play, he denounced the gamblers.

They put him out of the house at the point of a revolver. But, as he had expected, they soon left the apartment and entered their car, taking Mary with them. Gordon had lain in wait in a nearby hallway. Summoning a policeman and a taxi, he gave chase. He and the officer managed to overtake the car and compel the three passengers to descend. But by a clever trick, the pair disarmed the policeman, and using their own gun to make good their escape, re-entered their machine and sped away.

Mary Falconer and Gordon were left standing in the street. His arms went protectingly about the girl's shoulders and he drew her to him. That was the beginning of better things.

MAJESTIC.

IN FEAR OF HIS PAST (Two Parts—Dec. 20). John Burton is sent to prison for a crime he did not commit. On his release he seeks employment and is engaged as private secretary by old Col. Gray who prides himself on being a judge of human nature and asks no references. Col. Gray is a widower, irascible and difficult to please. The crafty old Colonel tests his new secretary to find out if he is sincere and honest and Burton stands the tests.

After Burton is established in his new place, he meets an old acquaintance, who is an adventuress and who knew Burton and had herself committed the crime. She forces Burton to introduce her to the eccentric Colonel as his sister, and by her wiles soon fascinates the susceptible but impotent old man, who engages her as his housekeeper. At the same time she loves Burton, whom she designs to marry, once she has captured the Colonel's fortune and the old man is dead, which promises to be soon, owing to his feeble condition.

Into this strange household now comes the Colonel's granddaughter, Polly Ann, an orphan, whom he cannot refuse to take in. Polly is full of joy and sunshine, the exact antithesis of the Colonel. She captures his old heart, despite the schemes of the designing adventuress, and by bringing fresh air, sunshine and the joy of living into the house, revives his health. At the same time she wins the love of Burton and the hatred of Mary Jennings. The latter plots to undermine her, but finding this hopeless, she plans to make a clean-up and get away, forcing Burton, by threats of exposing his past, to become her accomplice.

The Colonel sets out with Polly for a few days at the seashore, giving Burton and Mary Jennings a vacation. Mary seizes this opportunity to rob the house, with Burton as her unwilling aid. To cover their tracks, she dresses as a man and she and Burton prepare to enter the house as ordinary burglars. Meanwhile the Colonel is taken with a temporary illness, and with Polly returns to the house. She telephones for a doctor, but the doctor is delayed. Mary Jennings and Burton disguised as burglars, enter the house by a window and are heard by Polly, who thinks them unknown burglars. The Colonel has fallen asleep and has heard nothing. Polly, who has been in the kitchen heating water, tries to get out of the kitchen door, but the cook has carried off the key. To get to the telephone, or another door, she must pass the burglars. She almost succeeds, when she is astounded to discover their identity. She pauses in hiding and listens. Mary Jennings has just picked up a necklace belonging to Polly, which Burton objects to taking. A quarrel ensues, to which Polly listens in amazement. The Colonel also hears the voices and listens at another door. Burton, having taken one step in rebellion against Mary's power over him, decides to free himself entirely and repudiate the entire plot. He commences to replace the plunder in the safe. Mary says: "I will tell the old fossil you are an ex-convict."

Burton declares he doesn't care, and thrusting her aside, continues replacing the stolen stuff. She rages at him again, and Burton replies: "I was innocent and unjustly convicted, and you know it."

Mary looks at him in contempt and sneers back:

"Of course you were innocent, you poor boob, but who will believe it now?"

The Colonel, who has secured a revolver, steps out and declares he will believe it.

Mary is arrested and taken away.

THE BETTER WAY (Dec. 22).—Sunbeam's father is sent to prison, and on his release promises to remain honest. He secures a job as a night watchman, but his prison record being discovered, he is fired, and finds it impossible to secure work. Sunbeam gets a job in a a family as a "slavey" in order to support the father and herself, but her father chafes at the idea of his daughter working, although he does not know what her job is nor where. In desperation, he decides to turn crook again, and breaks into the house where his daughter is working. She discovers him, but allows him to escape, and tells her employers it was only a cat which had made the noise which brought them to the scene of the disturbance. Returning home later, she finally forgives her father his lapse, since it was for her, and they are happy again.

LOVE AND BUSINESS (Dec. 27).—Fred is an attorney for a patent derrick or windlass concern. One day while demonstrating the windlass, the hook catches on the dress of a woman and lifts her several feet from the sidewalk, exposing a few inches of stockings. The woman is a spinster and the thought that she has been placed in an unladylike attitude is terrible to her. The women in the anti-cigarette league, of which she is president, sympathize with her in her grief, and then suddenly thinking that she did it on purpose, just to be cute, they severely criticise her. The woman had previously shown them a present of some silk hose and they felt that she permitted herself to be caught, simply to show her silk stockings.

She files a claim against Fred's company and becomes a regular pest at his office. Fred has a pretty wife. One morning she burns the biscuits. Fred becomes sore and leaves the house in a huff, banging the biscuits against the wall. At the office he repents, while his wife sits at home crying.

He writes two letters, one a formal, curt, business note to the spinster lady, advising her that he will settle all claims against him for $500, and for her to reply by mail without trying to seek an interview. The other letter is a tender-worded, sentimental missive to his wife, containing love messages, and inviting her out to lunch. The office boy gets his dates mixed and places the letters in the wrong envelopes, with the result that the sorrowful wife gets teh formal business note while the spinster lady receives the tender love missive. Both have hysterics when the letters are received. The spinster lady in a rage consults the members of the anti-cigarette league, but they turn her down cold with the statement that no man would write such a letter unless he had received plenty of encouragement from the woman to do so.

The spinster lady then calls to her assistance her brother, who is a professional bruiser, and starts for Fred's office. Fred's wife considers suicide. She starts to die via the gas route, but the smells sickens her. She starts to take poison but the taste is too disgusting. She tries to shoot herself but don't have strength enough to pull the trigger. She phones for mamma and they start for Fred's office. The spinster lady with her letter arrives at the office and proceeds to clean up on Fred. Fred's wife and her mother are the next to arrive. They see the spinster lady beating up Fred and figure that he has been untrue and is getting beaten up by a woman whom he has fooled. They get in and also start to clean up on Fred. He got his, but finally manages to get the letters of the two women exchanged and everybody is happy. Fred then fires his cigarette-smoking, novel-reading messenger boy.

PERCY, THE MILLINER (Dec. 12).—Mrs. Biddle's husband does not like her new hat—so, to get rid of it, he gives it to his stenographer. Mrs. Biddle, however, comes to the office unexpectedly and seeing her headgear on her husband's employee, accuses Mr. Biddle of duplicity. She leaves in a huff, and, entering a cafe, orders luncheon. When she has eaten, however, she discovers that she has forgotten her purse. Percy, the milliner, from whom she bought her hat, and the one at the bottom of all her troubles, happens to be in the restaurant. He comes to her rescue and pays the bill. Supposing his attractive customer to be a widow, he decides to call the next evening. Meanwhile, Mr. Biddle has fired the stenographer and he and his wife have become reconciled. Percy calls, and Mrs. Biddle, supposing he is after his two dollars, allows him to come in. He begins immediately to make desperate love to her, and, hearing her husband coming, she hides Percy in a closet. The way in which the milliner contrives to make his escape caps the climax. Using an umbrella for a parachute, he soars out of his difficulties—leaving the Biddles once more a happily reunited pair.

THE GIRL IN QUESTION (Dec. 9).—Russell Walton's mother had no objection to his knowing a girl of Marie Boyd's type. In fact, she was sufficiently up-to-date to think it a rather good training for her son—but her choice for Russell's wife, decidedly, was Ethel Roberts. Young Watson has known and loved Ethel since childhood. Marie he had only recently met. Her "good fellow" ways inclined a trifle commonness, but Russell really was infatuated with her, and ashamed to let his mother know it. Mrs. Walton gave a dinner, to which she invited Ethel Roberts and Marie Boyd, with some of her "set." She even went so far as to include Spencer Harrison, an old flame of hers, whom Russell knew only as a rather notorious clubman. The night of the dinner young Wal-

ALLIANCE FILMS CORPORATION

Timely Words

The announcement of the Alliance Program was somewhat of a surprise to the trade in general.

Not so, however, to those who knew the many months of patient labor spent in crystallizing the scheme and in building the machinery of the gigantic organization.

The wheels have been turning since the 12th day of October, increasing in velocity and speed, until today the Alliance stands forth a tower of strength, and growing stronger every day.

The advertising of the Alliance has been honest. No false promises have been made. No wild statements of financial backing have been disseminated. What difference does it make to the exhibitor if plain Jim Smith or a high sounding financial name is behind a company? The exhibitor's only interest is the picture on the screen, and the sole aim of the Alliance Films Corporation is to place on its program the best feature films that can be had, and it has done so.

The Alliance Films Corporation is not hampered or controlled by any manufacturing company. It reserves the right to buy film on the screen, and it sets the standard for its film productions.

This plan has the complete approval of such manufacturers as are sincere in their determination to produce good film and really put the money into them.

The quality of the productions will increase steadily. It must not be forgotten that the Alliance Program was launched in the midst of certain conditions existing in the trade, and that it has steadily pulled away from these conditions. It has accomplished wonders in a very short time, and in the near future will stand apart and alone—and unquestionably the best program in the world.

Future announcements will show that the biggest and best things in filmdom are being done in the Alliance ranks, and that the exhibitor handling the Alliance Program will have reason to congratulate himself.

ton was frankly ashamed of his mother. But Marie found her "such a good sport." Mrs. Walton drank champagne and smoked cigarettes, and flirted with Harrison until Russell fled to Ethel for solace. The next day, when he remonstrated with his mother, the wise woman replied:

"But, my dear, I thought that was the sort of people you like to associate with."

A few days later, when she saw that Marie's photograph was gone from Russell's desk, she had no regrets for the champagne headache with which she had paid for her son's awakening.

IN TIME (Dec. 14).—Edward Stanley, a well-known writer, marries a society butterfly with no appreciation of his work. She is annoying him constantly and interfering with his studies. When he tries to show her his point of view and how imperative it is that he should have seclusion, she takes it as a personal affront, declaring that he is utterly indifferent to her enjoyment. Later, when business troubles come upon the impractical man of letters and he is obliged to sell his home to make good, Bella Stanley indignantly leaves him and goes to live with her mother. Not long after this, she is killed in an automobile accident. Meanwhile, Stanley, who is trying to ferret out who is to blame for things going wrong in his office, has occasion to investigate the life of his chief stenographer, whom he finds to be a girl of exceptional sympathy and character. Through Ida Drew's kindness to a poor messenger boy, however, the mismanagement of certain "trust funds" is traced to Robert Long, Stanley's bookkeeper. Stanley writes a novel, "In Tune," revealing the sympathetic relations between himself and Ida. When he gives it to her to read, she recognizes the chief characters in the romance—and not long afterward, she becomes the wife of the author.

THE PASSING OF TWO GUN HICKS (Two Parts—Dec 23). Two gun Hicks, a particularly deadly type of gun fighter, with an absolute disregard of human life, arrives a stranger at Moose Gulch, where he calmly shoots Bad Ike, the buly, who has tried to make him drink with him. Hicks is not interested in the dance hall girls, but when he sees the "decent" woman, the wife of the town drunkard, he determines to secure her, she repulses him. Hicks, unable to understand her loyalty to her husband, finally concludes that she must love the drunkard, and this belief alone prevents him from killing Jenks.

Hayes, a gambler, also desirous of securing Jenks' wife, incites the drunkard against Hicks, believing the latter will kill him. Jenks, crazed by drink, gives Hicks until five o'clock the following afternoon to get out of town, threatening to shoot him if he is not gone by that time. Hicks, seeing his chance to win the woman, decides to kill Jenks. That night Mrs. Jenks visits him and exacts a promise from him to spare her husband. He gives in to her because the only true love he has ever known is for her. The next afternoon at five o'clock, Jenks and the villagers wait for Hicks to either crawl or fight, but, despite the temptation, the two-gun man leaves the town quietly, and Jenks is congratulated as a hero. In the Jenks cabin the grateful woman offers up a prayer for the two-gun man as he slowly rides over the hills He has passed out of the life of Moose Gulch forever.

A POLITICAL FEUD (Dec. 24—Two Parts).—Tom Walton is a poor boy, attending the public schools. His mother, Mrs. Walton, earns a living for herself and Tom by doing washing and ironing for the wealthy people. Helen and Dick Kent, children of about the same age as Tom, are the pampered children of a wealthy mother, and have a private tutor. One day while Helen is riding her pony she is roughly treated by a crowd of the poor children and her pony is taken away from her. Tom comes along, rescues Helen from her tormentors and puts her on the pony and sends her home.

About ten years later Tom and Dick are attending the same college. Tom is working his way through college by working in a freight house nights. One night as Tom is coming back from work he meets Dick and a crowd of his wealthy friends. They surround Tom and a fight ensues, in which Tom is victorious. Tom graduates from college with highest honors.

After finishing college Tom and Dick are both nominated for governor of their state. Helen overhears a plan of Dick and his campaign managers to ruin Tom's reputation. Helen begs Dick to forego the plan. Dick refuses, and Helen, in order to repay the debt of gratitude to Tom, informs him of the plan, thus enabling him to win the election.

FEATURE FILM STORIES

ECLECTIC.

THE RUNAWAY LEOPARD.—We have no hesitation in pronouncing this film one of the most remarkable and intensely amusing animal pictures ever taken. A leopard is presented by his master, an animal trainer, to a scientist, and is delivered in his cage to that gentleman's apartment. While his new owner is petting him the beautiful animal escapes and then ensue some excruciatingly funny adventures.

An artist is visited and while he runs to shelter the beast proceeds to add a few extra touches to the unfinished painting upon the easel. In another apartment a family is at luncheon when the animal enters, and a riot ensues. Everyone takes to the stairs with the leopard in hot pursuit. Head over heels men and women scramble in the utmost confusion to a place of safety. On the ground floor is a millinery shop in which are a number of girls engaged in making hats. On a stand sits a pet monkey. Terror enters in the shape of the leopard. As the leopard tries to get the monkey the girls crowd the door fighting to get out. When all have reached the street, the leopard, disappointed in getting the monkey, follows them. A boy is passing carrying a live chicken. The leopard proceeds to chase the chicken. A little later with a path of devastation in his wake he is found by his old master, promptly captured and led down the street on a leash.

SOME NON-POISONOUS SNAKES.—On the same reel as foregoing. Here is an interesting educational showing certain snakes which are formidable only in looks and some of which, science tells us, are valuable from an economic standpoint, devouring as they do certain small rodents destructive to agriculture.

THE SILENT ACCUSER (Pathe—Four Parts).—Robert Macey perfects a telephone which enables the speaker to be seen as well as heard. His friend, Rifflord, advises him to interest Mr. Durling, a capitalist, and gives him a letter of introduction. Meeting the capitalist later, Macey succeeds in securing his financial assistance. About this time, Julian Delatour, a nephew of Durling, comes to visit his uncle and his cousin, Vera. Delatour has led a life of extravagance but hopes to replenish his coffers by a marriage with Vera. She, however, is greatly attracted by Macey and therefore gives her scheming cousin no encouragement in his suit. For revenge, Delatour manages to discredit Macey in the eyes of his uncle, and after a painful scene between the latter two, the inventor leaves the capitalist's house in anger.

Not long after, Durling succumbs to heart failure and his nephew gains control of the manufacturing plant wherein Macey's telephones are being made. In order to spy on Delatour's plans, Macey's younger brother, Jean, obtains a position in the factory. He notifies Macey that there is to be a demonstration before Miss Durling, whose assistance is essential to the absolute success of the invention. Macey contrives to be present and causes the demonstration to be a failure. Realizing that he is likely to lose his rights in the apparatus, Macey bequeaths his invention to Vera and then advises her, through a fictitious letter, that he has died and that the sole control of the invention is hers. Macey, disguised, delivers the perfected machine to Vera, but she penetrates his disguise. She does not let him know, however, that she knows who he is In a note, she is advised that she will be called on the new telephone at nine that night in order to make a trial of the apparatus.

About a quarter of nine Delatour calls personally with Redfield, a friend, and they try to persuade Vera to invest in 10,000 shares in a company formed for the exploitation of the new phone. She is suspicious of them and will not accede to their wishes. The two schemers decide to kidnap the heiress and hold her until she agrees to finance them. At this moment, nine o'clock, Macey attempts to call Vera on the telephone and is horrified to see the plotters throw a cloth over her head and bear her away. He hastens to her home but arrives too late to be of assistance. His brother, Jean, however, is on the job and follows the kidnappers to the mountains, where they take Vera in a limousine. Jean manages to drop notes on the way which are found by Macey, who hastens over the trail in his own machine. Seeing that they are pursued, the kidnappers feign an accident. Macey leaps from his machine to go to their assistance and is at once overcome by the schemers. Unconscious, he is placed in the auto with Vera and the door is locked. Delatour then starts the machine and guides it to a steep path down the mountainside. Leaping from the moving machine, he allows it to run unpiloted, hoping that the inmates will be dashed to death below. Congratulating themselves on the success of their scheme, the plotters return to the city where they expect to hold a meeting for the purpose of interesting government officials in the telephone. But they have not reckoned on Jean, who had concealed himself on the top of the auto. Recognizing the danger which confronts the now swiftly moving machine, Jean drops to the driver's seat and succeeds in stopping the auto. He then helps Vera to restore Robert and they, also, return to the city.

Hastening to the police, they explain the circumstances, and officers are detailed to return with them to arrest Delatour and Redfield. A messenger is sent in to call Redfield, who is immediately taken into custody. The officers then enter to arrest Delatour, but a sterner justice had claimed him first. In endeavoring to demonstrate the new telephone he accidentally comes in contact with a high power electric current which instantly electrocuted him, thereby bringing to an end an unworthy career.

PARAMOUNT.

THE BARGAIN (New York Motion Picture Co.—Seven Parts).—In the first scene, the country is alarmed by advice that Jim Stokes, the "Two-Gun Man" is in the neighborhood headed for the border, and warning is given to place a double guard around the stage on its trip through the canyon.

The warning is timely, for Jim is planning to hold up the stage and obtain a package of gold on it consigned to the express company. The stage is seen traversing a winding roadway through the marvelous scenery of the Grand Canyon, and at an opportune bend in the route Jim cleverly holds up and robs the stage, extra guard and all.

Jim has the lead in his attempt to escape, but his pursuers are close on his trail. He is wounded and his horse killed from under him. However, he manages to lose himself in the Bad Lands, and painfully makes his way to a spring, where he falls unconscious.

From this situation Jim is rescued by Nell Brent's father, who takes him to their home, where Nell nurses him back to health. He falls in love with his pretty nurse, and without revealing his identity is married to her. Conscience-stricken, he determines to return the stolen money to the express company, and riding to the nearest station for that purpose, is horrified to find a poster announcing a thousand dollars reward for his capture. He is seen and recognized, almost immediately, and the sheriff organizes a party for that purpose even while Jim's horse is hitched at the railing of the store. He learns the intent, however, and again makes a daring escape with his pursuers crowding close behind. He rides his horse into a pool of water, to lose the trail, puts a note under the saddle for his waiting bride, and sends his horse home. Again he starts on foot, but is finally captured in a typical western hotel combining saloon, gambling rooms and dance hall.

While waiting with his prisoner until train time, the sheriff is attracted by the revelry of the rooms below, and going downstairs, gets into the game and loses all of the stolen money he had just recovered from Jim. Returning then to his prisoner whom he had left in handcuffs, the sheriff said, "I'm a bigger thief than you are, Jim Stokes. I've lost the money you stole from the express company."

Seeing the sheriff's predicament, and wishing himself to be free, Jim proposes the bargain that if the sheriff will let him go, he will recover the money. This is agreed upon, and Jim's hand-cuffs are removed. He then arms himself, and going out through the window, enters the gambling room, and holds up the cashier. He gets the money, rushes out in the wildest excitement, mounts a horse, and is again pursued. The flight this time takes him to the edge of a great precipice with the posse at his heels. Without hesitation he chooses the plunge to capture and horse and rider are seen rolling over and over down the steep cliffside. Jim again escapes, covers his trail and reaches the hotel just in advance of the searching party. He enters the room in a semi-fainting condition, turns over the money to the waiting sheriff, is handcuffed, and hastily tumbles into bed just as the party comes to the door and gaining admittance, explains that the game had been held up and they thought in some way Jim might have escaped and "turned the trick."

The next day the sheriff starts with his prisoner, but safely away from the town, he looses the handcuffs, gives Jim two hours' start to get his bride, and wishes him good luck, thus fulfilling his part of the bargain.

Jim returns to Nell, is forgiven, and together they go across the border to another state.

THE GHOST BREAKER (Lasky).—The treasure of the Aragon family has never been found or any trace of it, until one day, while Princess Maria Theresa is looking over her jewels, she drops the casket and a secret compartment flies open, disclosing an old parchment which tells of a locket that contains the diagram describing the location. The Princess goes for the locket and finds it has been stolen. Carmencita, her maid, has stolen it and, being jealous of her rival, Juanita, for Jose's affections, has sold it to Gaines, an American art collector. Juanita, during a fit of jealousy, stabs Carmencita, and Carmencita, on her death bed, tells the Princess and her brother she sold the locket. The Duke D'Alva overhears the conversation and starts in search of it, as does the Princess and her brother.

In a southern town a feud has existed between the Jarvis and Markam families, and Markam kills Judge Jarvis. Warren Jarvis, his son, follows Markam to New York. Markam goes along the street and sees the locket brought from Spain by Gaines, the collector, and buys it. The Princess enters and finds the locket has been sold. She starts to find Markam. The Duke enters the store and asks about the locket, and he also starts to find Markam. The Princess gets the locket from Markam, who is at the same hotel that she is staying at. Jarvis, in search of Markam, finds him and kills him. While trying to escape he enters the Princess' room and tells her the story. Her trunk is nearly packed to go on the boat for her return to Spain. She hides Jarvis in trunk and he is taken on board the boat. In the meantime, Jarvis has telephoned to Rusty, his colored servant, to procure tickets. Two detectives enter and search for Jarvis, but fail to find him. He goes to Spain to help the Princess recover her treasure.

Before the Princess goes to America, her father, who enters the castle which is supposed to be haunted, but in reality the ghosts are only the tools of the Duke dressed in armour and as ghosts, is killed by the Duke's men who also capture her brother and hold him prisoner. Jarvis, upon his arrival in Spain, starts with Rusty, his servant, to explore the castle. While at the inn near the old castle, the Duke steals the locket from the Princess' bag and tells Robledo, his tool, to keep Jarvis away from the castle. The Princess learns that the locket has been stolen and tells Jarvis. Jarvis starts to go out, when Robledo appears with drawn gun; he and Jarvis both fire. Jarvis seriously wounds Robledo who, on his death bed, tells the Princess about the castle and also about her brother.

The brother, who has escaped by diving into the same place where the Duke's tools killed the Princess' father, swims the moat and escapes on the horse Jarvis rode to the castle. He notifies the police, who come to the castle. They are about to seize the Duke when he jumps down the trap and is killed. Jarvis and the Princess, then, each discover a mutual desire to possess the other and the story ends with the pair pledging their troth.

UNIVERSAL SPECIAL FEATURE.

DAMON AND PYTHIAS (Six Parts).—The scenes open on the Island of Sicily, four hundred years before the dawn of the Christian era, when Greece was in the height of her marvelous power and glory. The story opens in Syracuse, a city governed by a body of Senators. Dionysius, its chief of generals, covets the throne and is strongly opposed by the senator, Damon. Among the generals of Dionysius, Pythias is his favorite, for through his valor many laurels have been added to the fame of his chieftain. The friendship between the senator, Damon, and the warrior, Pythias, is a matter of note in Syracuse. Pythias goes to visit Damon at his villa near the city. The wife and son of the latter greet him, and the boy is delighted when the soldier presents him with miniature replicas of his own helmet, sword, shield and chariot. Meanwhile, in Syracuse, Dionysius sees Calanthe, daughter of Arria and the affianced of Pythias, and desires her as his own. Tablets come to the general from Agrigentum, stating that the city is being attacked by a horde of Carthaginians and its destruction is feared. Dionysius is asked to come with his armies or send a trusted general in command. Still coveting Calanthe, a vision of her dancing among the maidens, comes to the General, and he decides to send Pythias to battle, hoping that he may not return. Heedless of the pleas of Calanthe, the soldier, Pythias, leads his men to the besieged city. Fate, not favoring the plans of Dionysius, gives to Pythias victory. Calanthe, fearful of her lover's safety, seeks an oracle and in its black caldron sees a vision of her beloved surrounded by a grateful people. The head of his legions, Pythias, returns to Syracuse a conquering hero and is greeted by the admiring populace. Fetes and games are arranged in his honor. A chariot race is announced and Dionysius, still plotting, pits Aristle, the best charioteer in all Sicily, against Pythias. The race is run and Pythias is the victor and again the hero of the hour. So great becomes the soldier's popularity that Dionysius again desiring to destroy Pythias' fame, schemes to ascend the throne.

Pythias' wedding to Calanthe is set for the following day. Taking the time as auspicious, knowing that Damon will be absent from the Senate to attend the ceremonials of his friend, Dionysius plots with Philistus, president of the Senate, to be offered the crown. The Senate assembles. Philistus proposes to choose Dionysius as king. The minority protests and dispatches a messenger for Damon. The tyrant is crowned. Damon, banishing all thought of self in his desire to keep Syracuse a free state, attempts to assassinate Dionysius. He is thrown into prison when Pythias, summoned by a slave, begs Dionysius for pity. Damon asks to go and see his wife and child. Pythias becomes his hostage. Damon is given until sunset to return. Accompanied by his faithful servant, Lucullus, the Senator goes on horseback to his villa. Then to his friendship comes the greatest demand, to bid a last farewell to his wife and son and returns to set Pythias free while he dies upon the scaffold. Damon tears himself from his loved ones only to find that the too-faithful slave, hoping to detain him, has slain his horse. Syracuse is three leagues away. Damon attacks a soldier and takes his steed. The horse falls and is unable to go farther. Damon speeds on afoot.

Meanwhile, Dionysius, disguised, endeavors to test the friendship of Damon and Pythias. Calanthe, unsuspecting, goes with him to Pythias, and through her the plotting king tempts the young soldier to flee, telling him that Damon shall not return. Pythias struggles with self, his desire for freedom, his love for Calanthe, but his friendship for Damon triumphs. He will face death rather than dishonor. Sunset's hour arrives. Crowds gather about execution place. Pythias lays his head upon the block. The axe is lifted to strike just as Damon, exhausted and weak, falls into the arms of his friend. Throwing off his disguise, Dionysius commands the heralds to announce the pardon of the Senator, refusing to sunder such a friendship as that of Damon and Pythias.

THE MASTER KEY (Released Week of Dec. 7 Two Parts).—With his miners still hostile, Wilkerson realizes that he must get Dore out of the way, if only temporarily. Inasmuch as Dore has saved Wilkerson's life, thus preventing him from openly assaulting him, the scheming executor of Ruth Gallon's will plans to induce Dore to go to San Francisco. Accordingly he alters the books of "The Master Key" mine to make it appear that unless more capital is secured at once the mine will go into bankruptcy.

Wilkerson suggests that Dore leave at once, but Ruth's protector scents another conspiracy, and arranges that Ruth, instead of himself, shall make the trip to secure more capital. Wilkerson, who plans to oust both Ruth, the rightful heir to "The Master Key" mine, and Dore, accepts Dore's counter proposition with bad grace. Making the most of the opportunity to rid himself of one of the obstacles to the success of his schemes, however, Wilkerson consents to Ruth's visiting San Francisco in Dore's place. Upon Ruth's departure Wilkerson wires Mrs. Darnell, an old flame, to introduce Ruth to a 'Frisco confidence man, Charles Drake, as the Mr. Everett with whom she is to make arrangements for securing further capital for the financing of the mine. Drake is instructed to gain control of the deeds which Ruth takes to San Francisco with her.

Ruth, all unsuspecting of the net into which she is being drawn, is introduced to Drake, and intrusts him with the sending of a telegram to Dore, telling the young mine superintendent of her safe arrival in San Francisco. Drake sends the telegram after making himself acquainted with its contents. Dore, back at his mine, receives Ruth's telegram at the same time he is handed another puzzling wire from the real Mr. Everett, which reads: "Miss Gallon has not arrived; what is the trouble"? Upon comparing Ruth's telegram, which assures him that she has "met Mr. Everett at depot," Dore instantly realizes that something is amiss, and decides to leave for San Francisco at once to straighten out the matter.

Hearing of Dore's plan to leave, Wilkerson resolves to prevent his departure at all costs. For several hours he considers several plans, and finally decides upon one which he hopes will rid him for all time of the young mining engineer.

During the night he withdraws a pin from the brake on the rear wheel of the motor truck which Dore will use next day in making the journey from the mine to the railroad station. A half hour before Dore leaves Wilkerson rides ahead and fires the bridge at the foot of a steep decline down which Dore's truck must come. The bridge is hidden by a bend in the road, and the driver of Dore's truck fails to see the steadily mounting flames until he is half way down the side of the steep hill.

He at once applies the brakes to the truck, but the pin which Wilkerson has removed prevents the brakes from working, and the car soon attains a terrific momentum. Bounding from side to side of the narrow mountain roadway, the driver of the machine has great difficulty from preventing the truck from leaping the trail.

Realizing that death awaits him when the truck strikes the blazing timbers of the bridge, the driver jumps for his life into a ditch alongside the road. Dore, anticipating the driver's desertion, springs to the steering wheel of the truck just in time to prevent it from overturning. He applies the brakes frantically in an attempt to control the runaway car, but with no success.

With the flames of the bridge already beating in his face, Dore jumps at the last moment from the car, rolls down the hillside, and hangs unconscious over the edge of the canyon, into which the massive motor truck plunges through the rotten timbers of the blazing plank bridge.

The heat from the burning structure and the crackling of flames in nearby bushes and mountain grass brings Dore to semi-consciousness and a realization of his danger. Painfully crawling away from the canyon's edge to a bare rock where the flames cannot reach him, he again falls unconscious from his injuries. Wilkerson, meanwhile, has reached the station, and catches the local for San Francisco, believing that Dore has plunged into the depth of the canyon.

THE LAST EGYPTIAN (Oz Five Parts).—Kara, the last member of a long list of Egyptian rulers, learns from his grandmother upon her deathbed that an Englishman, Lord Roane, had dishonored the daughter of the imperial house, and that in his veins together with the blood of kings flows the blood of the perfidious nobleman. Before passing away she gives to Kara the key to the secret burial vaults and treasure chamber.

Kara vows to wreak a belated vengeance upon the head of the man who has sullied his family's honor. He takes with him enough treasures to carry out his purpose, goes to Cairo where he is received as a royal prince, and there finds Lord Roane. With Oriental cunning he sees that he can best pierce his enemy to the heart through the nobleman's beautiful granddaughter, Lady Aneth. He asks her hand in marriage, is refused, but still clings to his purpose. Enticing the girl's father to gamble, he ruins him and then offers to restore the winnings if the Englishman will give his consent. The nobleman puts him off, but the prince goes direct to the girl, and threatens her father with ruin unless she agrees to marry him, intending to inveigle her into a mock marriage.

To save her father from ruin and disgrace she consents to marry Kara at his palace that night. Winston Bey, her English lover, rescues her before she falls into the Egyptian clutches and hurries her to his yacht and sends her up the Nile. Kara, whose plans for a mock marriage have been completed, hears of her escape, leaves Cairo and at the head of a band of desert robbers attacks the vessel and makes Lady Aneth a prisoner. The robber chief refuses to deliver her to Kara until he has been paid. The prince hastens to the secret chamber for gold, and Viscount Cousinor, Aneth's father, follows him there.

A terrific struggle follows. The Englishman overpowers his antagonist, locks the stone door upon the Egyptian and leaves him to perish in the tomb of his ancestors. As the viscount is leaving the tomb he is killed by a slave girl, who mistakes him for Kara. Thus is the house of Kara avenged.

In the meantime the British authorities hear of the attack on the yacht, and dispatch a column of troops to the scene. Upon their approach the robbers flee and Lady Aneth is restored to the arms of her lover.

THE KEY TO YESTERDAY (Favorite Players).—George Carter, a revolutionist in South America, is the exact double of Frederick Marston, a famous artist in Paris. Carter is betrayed by a comrade and is sentenced to be shot. He takes a desperate chance and escapes on board a vessel bound for London.

In Paris Marston is stabbed by a model because he does not return her love. The wound incapacitates him from painting, and leaves an ugly scar, and he goes to America on a vacation. Highwaymen attack him, inflicting injuries which cause a total loss of memory. The robbers leave nothing in his pockets but the key to his Paris studio, and Marston adopts the name of Robert Anglo-Saxon. Five years later he falls in love with Duska Filson, a noted beauty, and at a dinner given by her he meets Gen. Robero, a South American ambassador, the man who condemned Carter to death. Robero believes Saxon is Carter and writes Saxon a letter warning him that if he marries Duska he will have Saxon extradited to South America and shot. Robero convinces him that he is Carter and Saxon goes to South America to pay the penalty of the crimes he believes himself guilty of. On the boat he meets Rodman, Carter's betrayer. Duska follows Saxon to South America and learns that Saxon has proven his innocence and departed two days before. She sends him a wireless and he has the ship stopped and lands at Puerto Frio, and learns that the revolution has broken out. In fighting his way through the lines he is shot and is placed on board a vessel bound for France by Rodman. Rodman tells Duska what has occurred and she follows Saxon to France. Saxon's mind clears and through the medium of the key which fits the lock of his house his identity is clearly established.

Duska learns that Saxon is the world-renowned artist and his a wife who is very ill. When Saxon reaches his home he finds Duska at the bedside of his wife, who has just died. Duska respects Saxon's grief and departs, with her dream of happiness shattered.

HEARTS AND FLOWERS (Cosmos).—Tom, the son of John and Mary Landers, an old-fashioned country couple is in love with a pretty country girl, who is also being courted by Walter Terry. Tom surprises the latter making violent love to her and, crazed with jealousy, strikes Walter and in the fight that ensues Tom accidently pushes Walter over the edge of a cliff. Fearing that he had killed his rival, Tom leaves the farm for the city. Unable to secure a position there, he appeals to his mother, who sends him money. He finally secures a position with Grant & Co., stockbrokers. The Wall Street fever soon gets the better of him and he tries his luck in the stock market. Being successful in his first venture, he plans to make a fortune. He writes his mother informing her that he has an opportunity to go into a good business for himself and begs of her a loan of $1,000. The devoted mother having faith in Tom's promise of a speedy return of the money, takes the money which they had saved to pay off the mortgage on the farm. Tom loses it in speculations and is ashamed to reply to his mother's appeals for the promised return of the money.

Meanwhile, Pa Landers is killed by an accidental discharge of his gun while out hunting. The poor widow is now unable to meet the payment of the mortgage and is forced to leave the old home.

Miss Elsa Norman, a society girl in the city, is attacked by a thief, but is rescued by Tom and a close friendship is the result of this incident, which later develops into mutual love.

Tom's mother arriving in the city visits him in his office. He is ashamed of her appearance and takes her to a boarding house in the suburbs and asks her not to call on him. Terribly hurt at the indifference of her son, she resolves never to annoy him again. Alone in her grief she is forced to move to a poor tenement house. She visits daily the lobby of Tom's office building, where she is seen one day by Elsa Norman, who in deep sympathy for the poor old woman gives her a bunch of violets, not knowing she is the mother of the man she loves.

Ma Landers' money gone, she is in actual want and is overcome one day by weakness and faints in front of the building, where she is picked up by Elsa and her chauffeur and carried to her miserable lodging. There she tells her story to Elsa, who is horrified to learn that the old lady is Tom's mother; Elsa 'phones Tom to come at once and he is brought face to face with the terrible result of the neglect of his mother. Elsa touched by the heroic acceptance of the old lady's sad fate, purchases the old farm and presents it to her.

Tom returns to the old homestead and in a touching love scene which follows Ma Landers forgives Tom, who wins back Elsa's love.

SHOULD A WOMAN DIVORCE? (Five Parts).—Grace Roberts, the only daughter of an Iowa farmer, while attending a girls' college meets Dr. Franklin with whom she falls in love. He loves her, too, but on account of his affected eyes, fears to propose. Edward Smith, a wealthy cattle dealer of Chicago, comes to the farm to purchase cattle. He is invited to attend the surprise party, given to Grace in honor of her graduation. He meets Grace. They become infatuated, and later are engaged. Dr. Franklin writes to Grace asking her to become his wife. Grace replies that his proposal comes too late; that she is already engaged. He comes to the farm, and endeavors to induce Grace to break off with Smith. Grace refuses and Dr. Franklin leaves.

Grace and Smith marry. Two years elapse. Grace and Smith and their little girl, Vivian, live in their palatial residence in Chicago. Smith makes Grace very unhappy on account of his utter neglect. One evening, Grace encountering Dr. Franklin, tells him of her marital troubles. Dr. Franklin again speaks of his great love for her and suggests an elopement. Indignantly she leaves him. On her way home she meets her husband in the company of two women. She follows them to a cabaret. Infuriated with jealousy she enters, and denounces them. In this state of mind she rushes from the scene, resolving to end her life. She approaches the river's edge, removes her coat and prepares to jump. She wavers and decides that he is not worth the sacrafice. She determines to go to the man who loves her and the next morning Dr. Franklin and Grace leave for New York under the assumed name of "Scott." Smith comes home, discovers the absence of Grace, and becomes greatly alarmed. He telegraphs her parents inquiring about her, then gives a general alarm to the police. Mr. and Mrs. Roberts are greatly agitated over their daughter's disappearance and come to Chicago to aid in the search. In the meantime a fisherman finds Grace's coat on the bank of the river and turns it over to the police, who in turn notify Smith of its discovery. He and Grace's parents go to the police station to identify it. On seeing the coat, they are convinced that Grace is dead. The mother blames Smith—becomes hysterical—and dies.

Six years elapse. Dr. Scott and Grace live quite happily in New York with their little boy, Walter. Dr. Scott is renowned as a stomach specialist. In Chicago, Grace's little daughter, Vivian, is very ill. A consulation of eminent physicians discloses the fact that she has an ulcer on her stomach and an immediate operation is necessary. Dr. Scott of New York is suggested as being best qualified to perform the operation and Smith takes Vivian to Scott who, after examining the child, decides to operate immediately. While arranging for the operation Grace and little Walter enter the room; Smith and Grace recognize each other. Smith threatens to turn Grace over to the police, but is stayed by little Vivian's pathetic appeal that no harm befall her mother. Learning the situation, Dr. Scott refuses to perform the operation, but Grace pleads with him and he finally consents.

The operation proves successful and the child is convalescing. Dr. Scott sits her up for the first time, and Grace kneels beside her. Smith enters and at the child's request comes to her side. Vivian grasps the hands of Smith and Grace, and childlike, pleads that they kiss and be friends. Grace cannot endure the child's earnest pleading. To Dr. Scott the touching appeal of the child is unbearable, and he cries out to stop. The strain is too great; he is stricken blind!

Grace's father, who had been informed of the fact that his daughter is still alive, arrives and pleads with Scott to allow Grace to go back to Smith. Grace overhears him and begs Smith to grant her a divorce so that she may stay with Scott who now needs her more than ever. Scott, hearing their subdued voices, imagines that Grace is tired of him on account of his helplessness. He is mad with fear and jealousy and the same night in a dream sees a vision of Grace in Smith's arms. He wakes from his sleep, helplessly attempts to go to her, and wildly calls to her. Hearing his cry, Grace approaches him; but the agony and suffering of the last few days had been beyond human endurance and Scott, as he is about to embrace her, passes away. Left alone, Smith and her family plead with Grace that she return to her husband, but she will have none of him. She goes back to the old farm with her father, there to spend the remainder of her days loving and caring for her two children.

THE ADVENTURES OF GAR EL HAMA (Four Parts).—After months of secret toil by day and by night, Gar El Hama perfects a means by which to escape from prison. He succeds at last in removing a slab from the floor of his cell and drops through a shaft to the engine room below. There he overpowers the engineer, dons the latter's clothing and is passed by the guard at the door on the pretense of going for oil.

Free again, he sets out for a new adventure. Disguising himself, he attends a reception given by Consul Johanna. Meeting the Consul's daughter, he decides to abduct her and demand ransom. During the reception he examines her apartments, unlocking a window, and returns in the night, entering through this window with his assistants, and takes her aboard the schooner owned by him and his pirate gang. He then sends an unsigned letter to the Consul, stating that his daughter, Katherine, will be held until a ransom of $25,000 is placed at the foot of Victoria Monument, naming a time when it should be placed there. Katherine's fiance, Lieut. Erskin, sets out to find her. He is told by pilots that a girl was taken aboard a mysterious schooner the night before, so he charters a tug and goes in pursuit of the schooner.

Gar El Hama and his gang arrive at Snake Island and take Katherine to their headquarters there. She escapes from the headquarters but is recaptured on the island and taken on board Gar El Hama's private yacht. Lieut. Erskin and his friends arrive at the island, attacking the pirate gang. Gar El Hama escapes through an underground passage and Erskin, as he gropes his way through the dark tunnel in search of Gar El Hama, is captured by the latter and taken to the yacht also, and is bound and locked in a stateroom. He finds a lighted lamp with which he burns the ropes, and forcing the door, sets himself free. The pirates neglected to take his revolver, so he goes down to the engine room, locks the engineers in a closet at the point of his revolver and overpowers the fireman. He pours water on the fire and removes parts of the engines, disabling them, which brings the yacht to a standstill. He does this, knowing that his friends are in pursuit, in order that they may overtake the yacht.

He steals up behind Gar El Hama, overpowers him, and then finds Katherine in the cabin. He seeks to defend her and himself from the pirates, but when Gar El Hama recovers, he and BORN AGAIN.—Dorothy Grey has a quarrel with her stepmother and goes on the stage. She meets with immediate success, but is disgusted with her surroundings. A theatrical manager makes himself obnoxious by his attentions, and when George Dunbar, a wealthy man, proposes to her Dorothy accepts him. The next day, immediately after the ceremony, Dunbar gives a dinner to a few friends at his country home. It is a fast crowd, and too much wine is drunk. In his intoxicated condition Dunbar is a revolting sight to Dorothy. Seeing that Dorothy is displeased, Donbar orders the people to leave. In his maudling state he tries to make up with Dorothy, but she will not permit him to touch her. Filled with revulsion she determines to leave her husband, but he catches her and throws her back into the room, her head striking on a chair. Dorothy later makes her escape.

Dorothy wanders aimlessly until sunrise, and is half delirious when she reaches the farm of the widow Marsh and her son, Jeff. Dorothy becomes hysterical and Dr. Morrow is compelled to give her a hypodermic injection. She awakens the next morning with her mind completely blank, the blow on the head having caused aphasia. She has the mind of a child, though she learns with astounding rapidity. With her matured brain, however, she acquires knowledge hourly, and soon her mind is completely restored, though her memory prior to her arrival at the farmhouse, when she gave a fictitious name, is entirely blank.

Jeff falls in love with Dorothy and the two are married. On the night of the wedding Dr. Morrow is called away. Dr. Morrow finally comes back and the wedding takes place. A year later a baby is born and Dorothy's memory is completely restored.

In visions she lives again the incidents which made her twice a bride, and she turns from her baby in horror and refuses to see Jeff. To the doctor she tells her story and the name of her first husband. The doctor then tells her what occurred on the night of her marriage. Dunbar had gone out in his racing car in an intoxicated condition, and, falling over a high cliff, had been killed. The call for the doctor came when he was at the Marsh home, and he hurried to the scene of the accident. It therefore developed that Dunbar died thirty minutes before Dorothy's second marriage. The doctor calls Jeff, and he is joyfully received by his wife.

THANHOUSER SYNDICATE.

ZUDORA (Episode Four—"The Secret of the Haunted Hills"—Reels Seven and Eight—Two Parts).—Storm's parents, good country people who have given him a heritage of clean blood and excellent traditions, live in a village surrounded by hills that seem veritably to stand guard over the small town's security. However, on those very hills and in the very homes of the people, themselves, the wraith of a monstrous, fleshless, bullet thridded hand has recently appeared without explanation. The people are wild with fright occasioned by something they cannot explain, and Storm receives an urgent letter from his parents to come to them.

Sending a note to Zudora, he rushes home to his parents and is welcomed, not only by them but by the maid servant and a half-witted boy, whom, by mistake, he once had shot through the hand during his boyhood. Zudora, too, comes to see his parents and is welcomed by them as a future daughter-in-law. As they are all rejoicing together, suddenly on the wall of a further room the specter hand appears. Storm's father rushes for his shot gun, and fires at the uncanny hand. The lead hurtles through the wall and strikes the serving maid in the arm. Suspecting that her uncle, Hassam Ali, is at the bottom of all this Zudora and John Storm hasten back to town. Zudora sees the famous mystic first, and is met, of course, with a baffling denial. Then Storm comes and after a painfully heated exchange of words the older man tries to shoot the young lawyer. In the struggle that ensues Hassam Ali is gradually overcome and bent back across a table top only to be rescued by Zudora just as Storm is about to be stabbed in the back by the mystic's Hindu servant.

Going back to the excited townspeople who have gathered at the station to meet him, Storm comforts them by saying that the wonderfully clever Zudora is coming to their rescue and that she will solve the mystery. After several thrilling adventures Zudora and Storm finally decide that the source of the mysterious apparition is in the upper room of one of the farm's outbuildings. While Storm makes some other investigations Zudora runs to this place and is caught in the garret by the idiot boy, tied, gagged and a rope wound round her neck. She closes her eyes hopelessly as a bandage is tied about her head. Then the scene shifts and John Storm is seen walking across the fields in the direction Zudora has taken. He has finally decided that she has hit upon the right idea and that he went off on a false scent. As he walks slowly along, of a sudden he feels a sense of impending evil. He begins to run. As if directed by some unseen guide, Storm rushes up the stairs of the outbuilding and grapples with the idiot boy, subdues him and rushes to Zudora. Swiftly he unties the ropes. They climb to an upper room and discover the stereopticon machine which has thrown on the landscape the X-Ray photograph of the skeleton hand.

IN THE NAME OF THE PRINCE OF PEACE (Dyreda—Four Parts).—Waldo, son of Baron von Kraft, comes home from college and finds a reception in progress. All of the rooms are occupied, as Waldo braves old legends by offering to sleep in a room which is said to be haunted. His sister and her girl friends decide to play a prank on him. They borrow a skeleton from one of the medical students nearby and place it in the room. Waldo leaves his sweetheart to go upstairs. He comes face to face with the skeleton and the shock causes him to lose his mind. The girls in fright tell the Baron of their prank and its result. As the Baron goes up, the boy's door opens and he comes down, with staring eyes and his hair white as snow. The boy does not recognize his father and the agony in his face crushes the father and the thoughtless girl. The girl tries to atone for her sin by retirement to a convent.

War is declared between Germany and France, and the father leaves to join his regiment. Into the tent of the Baron is brought a French spy. The Baron changes clothes and impersonates him to steal important information. The convent of St. Agnes is taken by the French as a fortification. The Baron is caught as a spy in the convent. His daughter recognizes him and tries to give him a message, but is discovered. They force her to swear on the crucifix that he is a German and his execution is ordered. The Germans finds out about the Baron and attempt to rescue him, but arrive too late. The spirits of the heroes slain in the conflict are seen rising from their earthly bodies with arms outstretched on the way to that land where "war" is unknown.

"FLOSSIE'S DARING LOYALTY" (Dec. 22)—Manly Mann loves Flossie Fay, his stenographer. Montague Marks, villainous business rival, sees Manly dictating what purports to be an important business document, and enters the office when Flossie is alone before she can transcribe her notes. He endeavors to bribe and frighten her into reading him the notes in the document. Flossie refuses and Montague leaves vowing vengeance.

At a nearby den he hires a band of thugs to assist him. They return to the office and failing to bluff the brave Flossie they drag her from the office and down the street. Manly returns to find the office a wreck, and fearing for Flossie's safety, he adjourns to the street where he finds handkerchiefs and hair switches which confirm his suspicions of foul play. He arouses the police who promise to come at once to the rescue.

Manly tracks the thugs to their den where he gathers from a dope fiend that after failing to force Flossie to read her notes, the ruffians have carried her to the woods where they intend to tie her to a tree and explode a keg of powder blowing her to atoms. Manly hastens on, arriving in the nick of time. He vanquishes the whole gang single handed and piles them up unconscious, then he and Flossie take their departure. They return to the office and meet Benton who is anxious for his papers, and while he and Manly guard the door with revolvers, Flossie nervously transcribes her shorthand notes and hands them over a formula for dandruff cure.

"THE SINGLE ACT." (Special—Two Parts—Dec. 23.)—George Burton bursts into the little saloon he sometimes frequents and examines a fat wallet. On a shady street an elderly gentleman is discovered by a policeman, to whom he describes George as his assailant. In the saloon the barkeeper, of a philosophical turn of mind, nods in approval as he reads a paragrapher's comment and he shows it to George—"A man, however damned, can justify his existence in one single act." This starts the formation of a thought in George's mind. He leaves for his lodging house just in time to escape the policeman searching for him. George arrives at his room, sees that this and the adjoining room are not watched, and slides into the adjoining room through a secret passage he has constructed through the abutting wardrobes. It transpires, as he hurriedly starts to change and clean up, that he is living in a dual role. The near-sighted landlady admits the policeman, but when he looks at the transformed George suspiciously, indignantly denies that George is other than her star boarder.

George is loved by Mary Fox. Her father is suspicious of George's calling but has no positive grounds on which to act, and break his daughter's happiness. The same night, following the foregoing holdup, George plans a rich haul at the banquet following a fashionable wedding. The police have planted a detective in his room to wait for him but he succeeds in donning his crook outfit and eluding the sleuth. At the fashionable home, he is seen by the watchman as he clambers in the nursery window, and only escapes capture because little Dorothy denies being out of her room, to escape a scolding for stealing out to watch the party. Little Dorothy discovers him, however, and starts the better impulse. He starts to clamber out the window but the watchman is waiting and shoots. A chase through the banquet hall leads to George's lodging and he again escapes through knocking out the waiting detective, throwing a chair through the window to divert attention, and sliding through the secret passageway. With the coming of morning the secret passage is discovered but George is off in his better role to see Mary, but is killed by an explosion. The police arrive too late, and Mary never knows that her sweetheart lost his life in the act that would justify his existence.

proposed abandonment of their plans, Marie demands that he remain with her, leaving the matter of the epidemic in the hands of his subordinates, and declares that if he really loved her he would not leave her so soon, it not occurring to her to return with him. When he is firm in his intention to go back to his duty, the girl angrily informs him that if he persists in parting with her now, it will be forever. Loving her passionately, John is almost brokenhearted, but goes, and a complete estrangement results, Marie, in her selfish pride, refusing to consider anything but her personal viewpoint. Marie, who really loves her husband, attempts to find forgetfulness by social activities, but with small success. In the midst of her pleasures, she will see a vision of John, fighting desperately for the lives of the people of his city. Unconsciously, she becomes more thoughtful taking an interest in helpless and unfortunate persons of whom she hears. One of these is an old woman, very poor, almost an invalid, but who, nevertheless, is gentle and rather sadly happy. With her Marie becomes friends and at length is shown a wedding gown, yellow with age, and told a story.

Fifty years before the old lady put on the wedding gown and started to the church where she was to wed the youth of her heart. Before she reached it, however, came wild tidings—they were fighting at Bull Run—the Standards of the South were reeling backward in defeat—every sword and every man was needed in desperate haste. Delaying only for a single kiss, the lover galloped away, and the girl returned to her home to take off the wedding gown she would never again put on, for though there came news of the victory, snatched from defeat, and a deed of splendid valor, the youthful lover did not return. But, through the long years his memory had been cherished in fond pride, and in the knowledge that her lover had not failed at duty's call, and that she had not hesitated to make her sacrifice upon the altar of patriotism, she who had been the girl of long ago had found a serene content. Marie soon afterward reads that the epidemic has been suppressed, but that John Woodward, bravely exposing himself that others might be protected, is desperately ill. With a sudden awakening to a realization that peace may hold its duties and dangers no less than war, and with a heart filled with love and repentance, she hurries to his side, and in an agony of suspense awaits the crisis, which comes and passes, and it is known that he will live. He looks at her with recognition, and as she bends tenderly over him he whispers: "I could not love thee, dear, so much, loved I not honor more!"

"THE LURE OF THE GREEN TABLE" (Dec. 25.)—Harry Woods is a young business man and a member of the most exclusive clubs. He is engaged to be married to Jessie Vail, a pretty young music teacher. The card room of the club holds him in its grip until he is heavily in debt to several of his companions. He determines to get away from the old influences, go West and make a home, so that he and Jessie can marry. In one of the frontier towns Harry makes a dicker with Jim Law, a real estate dealer, buying a small ranch on time. Two years of hard work follow. Then Harry writes Jessie that he will make the last payment on the ranch the following day and that he will have quite a nice sum of money left over. Harry goes to the village to make his last payment and Law is not in his office; he finds out however, that Law can be found in the town's gambling hall. After some hesitation Harry enters the place, finds Law at the bar, pays his money, and gets his deed to the ranch. As Harry is about to leave one of the men playing poker at the table near is called away in the midst of a big pot. The man asks Harry to play out his hand. Harry plays the hand and as the man returns the Easterner rakes in a big pot. The gambler takes over his seat.

Arrived at his ranch house, Harry is strangely agitated, nervous. The feel of the cards and the chips on the green table has aroused the fever dormant for two years. There is a desperate struggle and the green table wins. Taking some of his ready money from his strong box, Harry returns to the hall and sits in the poker game. A month passes. Harry has lost all of his cash on hand. The fever envelops him; he even neglects to write to Jessie. The girl, worried that she receives no reply to her letters, determines to go to him and leaves for the West. Meanwhile Harry, in his crazed desire to gamble, uses the deed to his ranch, his last asset, to buy chips. This, too, is lost, and a moment later a cowboy who has seen Jessie at the railroad station enters and announces that a mighty pretty girl is coming out on the stage. The head gambler, in a spirit of bravado, turns to the dazed, desperate Harry and says, "Hard luck, pard. Here's one more chance. I'll cut you to see who will welcome that pretty girl." Harry refuses, but the gambler finally stings him into assenting. They cut the cards and Harry loses. The gambler laughs and leaves the hall. Harry takes a stiff drink and finds his way to the street. The stage is just arriving. Jessie descends and the gambler tries to talk to her. The girl, shrinking back, looks about for Harry. The latter, in a stupor, stumbles on the scene. The girl, with a cry, throws her arms about Harry. The gambler, with a curse at Harry for trying to take the girl away, shoves Jessie to one side and covers Harry with his gun, but the stage driver interferes and tells him that Jessie is Harry's sweetheart and come out to marry. With the characteristic big heart of the West, the gambler makes Harry take back the deed to the ranch and the greater part of his lost money. And the love of a good woman takes up the fight against the lure of the green table.

"BRANNIGAN'S BAND" (Dec. 26). Mrs. Casey wants to run to the store and calls Casey to mind the baby. Michael Brannigan starts practicing on a brass horn and wakes the baby. Then Casey brings the baby out in the yard, where Mike can hear it. Casey's arguments seem to lack force and he beats a retreat when the rest of the band arrives. Angelo, an organ grinder, passes along the street and Casey hires him to join the concert. The band can't tell what they are playing and throw rocks at Angelo. Angelo comes over the fence with a knife and they retreat, but rally again and chase him back again. Angelo blames Casey and they are having a row about it when Mrs. Casey returns. She vanquishes Angelo with a broom and then proceeds to douse the band with water, which effectually stops the concert.

"A TROUBLESOME CAT" (Dec. 26).—The hard working bill poster is worn out and jumps into his cozy cot. He is hardly asleep when a cat appears at the open window and commences his nightly conversation in treble tones. Not having anything handy to throw, the bill poster jumps out of bed and coyly endeavors to catch his tormentor and wring his neck, but the cat is too active and a chase begins.
